COMPS: skála-glam, a nickname, see Jónsv. S. ch. 42; whence Skál-rjar, Landn. skála-mark, -merki, n. the sign líbra, Rb. skála-pund, n. a weight, Dan. skaal-pund, Rétt. skála-vegin, rt. weighed in scales, D. N.

SKÁLD, n., pl. skáld; the word is in poetry rhymed as skald (with short vowel), skald and kálda, aðlri and skaldi, Kormak, and so on; it the plural is always spelt skáld, not sköld; the mod. Dan. skjald is borrowed from the Icel.: [the etymology and origin of this word is intested; Prof. Bergmann, in Message de Skirnir, Strasburg, 1871, 54, derives it from the Slavonic skladi=composition, skladacz=compositor; but the earliest usages point to a Teutonic and a different pt. In the ancient law skáldskapr meant a libel in verse, and was synonymous with flimt, danz, nið, q. v.; the compds skáld-fífl, leir-skáld (q. v.) also point to the bad sense as the original one, which is still noticeable in popular Icel. usages and phrases such as skálda (the verb), skáldi, seldinn (libellous), see also skáldmæz below. On the other hand, skálda, Germ. schalte, means a pole (see skálda, skáld-stöng below); lels and imprecations were in the ancient heathen age scratched on trees, see the remarks s. v. nið, niðstöng. The word is therefore, we believe, to be traced back to the old libel-pole, 'scald-pole;' if so, Engl. scald=to abuse, Germ. schelten, may be kindred words; the old Lat. phrase (of Mart. Capella) barbara fraxineis sculptatur ruma tabellis may refer to this scratching of imprecations on pieces of wood.]

B. A poet, in countless instances; þeir vóru skáld Haralds konungs kappar, Fas. i. 379; forn-skáld, þjóð-skáld, nið-skáld, hirð-skáld, l-skáld, krapti-skáld, ákvæða-skáld, as also sálma-skáld, rimma-skáld; i. nicknames, Skáld-Helgi, Skáld-Hrafn, Skáld-Refr, Landn., Fms. given to those who composed libellous love-songs (7); Svarta-skáld, Hvíta-skáld. Some of the classical passages in the Sagas referring to poets, esp. to the hirð-skáld, are Har. S. hárf. ch. 39, Hák. S. Góða ch.

32, Eg. ch. 8, Gunnl. S. ch. 9, Ó. H. ch. 52-54, 128, 203, 205, O. H. L. ch. 57, 58, 60-62, Har. S. hárf. (Fms. vi.) ch. 24, 101, 108, 110. The Egils S., Korm. S., Hallfred. S., Gunnl. S. are lives of poets; there are also the chapters and episodes referring to the life of the poet Sighvat, esp. in the Fb., cp. also Sturl. i. ch. 13, 9. ch. 16; for imprecations or libels in verse see nið.

COMPS: skálda-gomlur, f. pl., see Isl. þjóðs. ii. 557. skálda-spillir, m. 'skald-spoiler,' the nickname of the poet Eyvind; the name was, we believe, a bye-word, a 'poetaster,' 'plagiarist;' we believe that this nickname was given to this poet because two of his chief poems were modelled after other works of contemporary poets, the Háleygja-tal after the Ynglinga-tal, and the Hákonar-mál after the Eiríks-mál; (as to the latter poem this is even expressly stated in Fagrsk. 22); the word would thus be the same as ill-skálda, a word applied to a poet for having borrowed the refrain of his poem, Fms. iii. 65. Skálda-tal, n. a List of Poets, a short treatise affixed to the Cod. Ups. of the Edda and the Cod. Acad. primus of the Heimskringla.

skálda, u, f. [O. H. G. scalta; mid. H. G. schalte], a pole or staff, whence a flute, pipe; skálda með tön, a flute made of walrus tusk, D. N. iv. 359. 2. [mid. H. G. schalte], a kind of boat, Edda (Gl.).

II. Skálda, a contr. form of Skáldskapar-mál (List of Authors C. I), but usually applied to the old collection of Philological Treatises affixed to the Edda, (List of Authors H. I.)

skálda, að, to make verses, but in rather a bad sense.

skálda, að, [cp. Engl. scall or scald], to rot, fall off, of hair; skáldaðr. skáld-eik, f. [Germ. schalt-eiche], the holm-oak, ilex, þd. (the MS. has skál-eik).

skáld-fé, n. a 'skald-fee,' reward for a poem, Ad.

skáld-fífl, n. a poetaster (perh. originally a libeller), Edda 49.

skáldi, a, m. a poetaster, a nickname given in Icel. to vagrant, extemporising verse-makers; thus in this century Páll skáldi (a vagrant priest and verse-maker); and in the 16th century Bjarni skáldi; the word is never applied to really good poets. 2. as a nickname, Baut. (on Runic stones).

skáld-kona, u, f. a 'skald-queen,' a poetess, a nickname of a woman, for which the reason given is this; hann átti þórhildi skáldkonu, 'hón var orðgíf mikitt ok fór með flimtán,' she was a 'word-witch,' and made libels, Nj. 49.

skáld-ligr, adj. (-liga, adv.), poetical, Fms. ii. 50.

skáld-maðr, m. a poet; skáldmenn mikir, Isl. ii. 191.

skáld-mær, adj. a 'skald-maid,' poetess, a nickname of the poetess Jónunn, Fms. i. 13; the name of her poem Sendi-bít looks as if it had been of a 'biting' libellous kind.

skáld-pípa, u, f. a 'skald-pipe,' a flute (?), Clar. 135.

skáld-skapr, m. 'scaldship,' poetry: I. a libel in verse; eigi skál lýsa legorðs-sök um skáldskap, Grág. i. 351; ef maðr kvæðr skáldskap til háðungar manni, . . . ok varðar þat skóggang, skal sækja sem annan skáldskap, ii. 151, see the whole chapter in Kb. ch. 238, inscribed, um Skáldskap, of Libels; the word is therefore used synonymously with danz and flimt, nið, q. v.

II. poetry in a good sense, Edda passim; Sighvatr var ekki hrað-mæltr maðr í sundr-lausum orðum, en s. var honum svá tiltækr, at hann kvæð af tungu fram svá sem hann mælti annat mál, Ó. H. 171; ok kom þar brátt taliu at þeir ræddu um skáldskap, þótti hvárum-tveggja þær ræður skemtiligar, Eg. 686; skáldskap grein, -háttir, poetical metre, Skálda 183, 210; skáldskapar laun = skáldfé, Eg. 152. Skáld-skapar-mál, n. pl. poetical diction, Edda 49, Skálda 195; hence the name of the second part of the Edda, the ancient Ars Poetica, containing the rules and laws of ancient poetry.

Skáldskapr in old writers refers to the 'form' (metre, flow, diction), not to the contents; even in such phrases as, ekki var mikill skáldskapr í því kvæði, there was not much 'scaldship' in that poem, it was a bad composition, Fms. vii. 38.

skáld-stöng, f. a 'libel-pole,' a pole with imprecations or charms scratched on it; ef maðr reisir stöng ok kallar s., þá hefir hann fyrir-gört hverjum penningi fjár síns, N. G. L. i. 430.

S. ch. 11; in Landn. i. ch. 2, 2. ch. 13, the skáli is a detached building; drykkju-s., a drinking ball; svefn-s., a sleeping ball. In Grág. i. 459 distinction is made between eldhús and skáli; in the Sturl. skáli is distinguished from stofa; and it seems that the men were seated in the former, the women in the latter. At still later times, and so at present, the skáli is an apartment near the entrance, a kind of for-skáli, q. v.; til þess er sér mann ór skála-dyrum ór fjöru í Nesdal, Vm. 87.

B. Remarks on the shield.—A shield was raised as a signal in time of war; a red shield betokened war (rauðr skjöldr, her-skjöldr), a white shield peace (hvít skjöldr, friðar-skjöldr, a peace-shield); in a battle the red shield was hoisted, Hkr. i. 33; but, bregða upp friðar skildi, to hoist the (white) shield of peace, was a sign that the battle was to cease; hann lét skjóta upp skildi hvítum, Fagrsk. 61, Fms. vii. 23; hence also the phrase, bera herskjöld, or fara herskildi, to barry, overrun a land with the 'war shield,' see frið-skjöldr and her-skjöldr (s. v. herri). War ships were lined from stem to stern with a wall of shields,—skip skarar skjöldum, or skjaldat skip; hann kom í Bjarnar-fjörð með al-skjölduðu skipi, síðan var hann Skjaldar-Björn kallaðr, Landn. 156. The halls of the ancients were hung all round with a row of shields, Gm. 9, Edda 2, Eg. 43, see the curious story in Fas. iii. 42. For the shield-wall in battles see skjald-borg. Ancient sayings; nú er skarð fyrir skildi, now there is a gap for a shield, a breach in the fence, of a heavy loss, such as the death of a person, nú er skarð fyrir skildi, nú er svanrinn nár á Tjörn, Jón Þorl.; höggva skarð í skildi e-s, to cut a notch in one's shield, inflict a severe blow, Orkn. (in a verse). Shields were furnished with a painted or carved 'ring' representing mythological or heroic subjects; these rings are the earliest works of Northern art on record, hence come the names rit, baugr, rönd, of which rit points to scratching (whereas Bragi used 'fá' = to paint); rauðum skildi, rönd var ór gulli, Hkr. i. 33. Such shields were a lordly gift, and gave rise to several ancient poems treating of the subjects carved or painted on the shield, such as the famous Haust-löng by Thiodolf, the Ragnars-kviða by Bragi, the two Beru-drápur (Shield-songs) by Egill; these 'shield-lays' were afterwards the sources of the writer of the Edda, but only a few fragments are preserved; (cp. the Greek lay on 'the shield of Heracles,' and the lay on Achilles' shield in the Iliad.)

Skjöldungar, m. pl. the famous lineage of the kings of Denmark, from Skjöld, the son of Odin, Edda, Yngl. S. The Danish legend derives the name from his being found in infancy in a bed of reeds to which he had floated on a shield; but in fact the name is derived from the ancient Teutonic custom of electing the king by lifting him on a shield in the assembly. this beautiful and time-honoured custom then general, but now perhaps fast dying out.

SÓN, f. [Germ. sühne, ver-söhnung]:—an atonement, sacrifice, of the heathen age; this ancient Teut. word remains in the Norse only in a few COMPS: sónar-blót, n. an atonement-sacrifice, and at the same time an oracle; Dagr konungr... gékk hann þá til sónar-blóts til fréttar, Hkr. i. 24. The ancient sacrifice of atonement (sónar-blót) was thus performed:—the largest boar that could be found in the kingdom was on Yule-eve led before the king and his men assembled in the hall; the king and his men then laid their hands on the boar's bristly mane and made a solemn vow, strengja heit at Braga-fulli. The animal being sacrificed, divination took place, probably by chips shaken in the boar's blood; for descriptions see Herv. S. ch. 10 (Fas. i. 531, 532), Hkv. Hjörv. (the prose), Yngl. S. ch. 21 (ganga til sónar-blóts til fréttar). The boar's head at Yule-tide in Queen's College, Oxford, is probably a relic of this ancient heathen sacrificial rite.

The word is no doubt borrowed from the Latin, for as the Old Northmen and Teutons had no towns, they had no streets; it is therefore strange to find such a word in an old poem like Hóm. 13, (the passage is prob. corrupt); so also, einn dag var þat er Kormakr gekk um stræt, Korm. 228, referring to the middle of the 10th century; but as the Str. is of the 12th, the words may perhaps here too be taken as an anachronism; Ólafr konungr gekk einn dag úti á stræti, Fs. 115, referring to the year 996; since in the 11th, and esp. in the 12th and 13th centuries, the word becomes freq. in Sagas referring to Norway, but never to Icel. Fms. vi. 363, vii. 39. Blas. 40. In the old Norse market-towns of the 11th, 12th, and following centuries, the 'street' ran along the shore (bryggjur), with 'scores' or cross lanes (veitur or almenningar) leading up to the houses (garðar), N. G. L. ii. 240, 243; strætis-búð, a street-booth, opp. to garðs-búð, iii. 113; strætis-göð, ii. 244; strætis-kaup, i. 324; strætis-lopt, -stofa, D. N. SUMAR, n., dat. sumri; pl. sumur; sumra, sumrum; in the old language this word was masculine in the form sumarr, of which gender a trace may still be seen in the contracted forms sumri, sumra, sumrum, for a genuine neuter does not admit these contractions. But there remains a single instance of the actual use of the masculine in the rhyme of a verse of the beginning of the 11th century, sumar hvern frekum erni, Skálda,—from which one might infer that at that time the word was still masc.; if so, it is not likely that in a poem so old as the Vsp. it would be neuter, and 'sumur' in 'of sumur eptir' perhaps ought to be corrected 'sumra' or 'sumar' (acc. sing.); as also 'varmt sumar' should be 'varmr sumar', Vpm. 26: [A. S. sumar; a word common to all Teut. languages; in the Orm. sumerr, denoting a long u; the mod. Dan., Germ., and Engl. have sommer, summer, with a double m]:—a summer, passim. II. mythical, Sumarr, the son of Svásad, Edda 13.

B. CHRONOLOGICAL REMARKS.—The old Northmen, like the Icel. of the present time, divided the year into two halves, summer and winter; the summer began on the Thursday next before the 16th of April in the old calendar, which answers to the 26th of the Gregorian calendar (used in Icel. since A. D. 1700). The Northern and Icelandic summer is therefore a fixed term in the calendar, and consists of 184 days, viz. six months of thirty days, plus four days, called aukanætr ('eke-nights'). Summer is divided into two halves, each of three months (= ninety days), before and after midsummer (mid-sumar); and the four 'eke-nights' are every summer intercalated immediately before midsummer; thus in the Icel. Almanack of 1872—Sumar-dagr fyrsti, or the first summer-day, falls on Thursday the 25th of April; Auka-nætr from the 24th to the 27th of July; Mið-sumar on the 28th of July; Sumar-dagr síðasti, or the last day of summer, on the 25th of October; cp. sumar-nátt síðasta, Gísl. 67. In mod. usage the time from April to October is counted by the summer weeks, the first, second, . . . twentieth . . . week of the summer, and in Icel. Almanacks every Thursday during summer is marked by the running number of the week. The ancients, too, counted the summer by weeks, but only down to midsummer, thus, tíu vikur skulu vera af sumri er menn koma til alþingis, K. þ. K. 166; but in the latter part of the summer they counted either by the weeks from midsummer or by the weeks still left of the summer, thus, hálfum mánaði eptir mitt sumar, Nj. 4; er átta vikur lífa sumars, Grág. i. 122; frá miðju sumri til vetrar, 147; er átta vikur eru til vetrar, Nj. 192; er tveir mánaðir vóru til vetrar, 195; líðr á sumarit til átta vikna, 93; ellipt., var Rútr heima til sex vikna (viz. sumars), 10.

C. COMPS: sumar-auki, a, m. 'summer-eke,' the intercalary week, an Icel. calendar-term; the ancient heathen year consisted of 364 days, or twelve months of thirty days each, plus four days, which were the auka-nætr or 'eke-nights' (see above); the remaining day and a fraction was gathered up into an intercalary week, called 'Summer-eke' or 'Eke-week,' which in ancient times was inserted every sixth or seventh year at the end of summer, which in such years was 191 days long; the 'Summer-eke' was introduced by Thorstein Surt (Thorstein the Wise) in the middle of the 10th century, see Íb. ch. 4, and is still observed in Icel.; now that the Gregorian style is in use in Icel. the intercalary week is inserted every fifth or sixth year; thus the year 1872 is marked as the 'first year after sumarauki,' (the years 1860, 1866, and 1871 being years 'with sumarauki'); 1872 sem er 'fyrsta ár eptir Sumarauka,' Icel. Almanack, 1872; the years 1864 and 1870 were 'fjórða ár eptir sumarauka'; thus in 1871 the summer had twenty-seven weeks, the eke-week being the 21st to the 27th of October. sumar-ávöxtir, m. the summer produce, Fms. x. 337. sumar-björg, f. support during the summer, Sturl. i. 136. sumar-bók, f. a summer-book (missal for the summer), Vm. 52, Pm. 86. sumar-bú, n. summer-stock, Sturl. ii. 65. sumar-bær, adj. calving in the summer. sumar-dagr, m. a summer day, N. SÚS, n. [cp. Dan. suse; Germ. sausen], the roar of the surf; a ḡ. ley.
in a paper MS. to Vsp. 17, at 'súsi,' to the roaring sea (?), but as both the extant vellums, the Cod. Reg. and the Hb., read 'húsi,' this reading, if correct, must be traced to some lost vellum of the Vsp. (perhaps a lost leaf of the Cod. Arna Mag. No. 748?). The context, and the paraphrase in Edda, 'með sævar-ströndu,' are in favour of the reading of the old literature; not even does the Edda (Gl. in the list of birds) record this word; but it is preserved in provincial Norse sýsvorta (sýsvorta, sýs- vorta) = turdus torquatus, the ring ousel, Ivar Aasen: the etymology is quite uncertain.

A. A ten, decade. The ancient Scandinavians and Teutons had no indeclinable numeral adjectives from twenty to a hundred; the word tigr (like hundred and þúsund) being a regular substantive. The ancient way of counting is therefore complex and curious; e. g. forty-one was called 'four tens and one,' or 'one of the fifth decade'; forty-eight was called 'four tens and eight,' or by counting back, 'five tens short of two,' cp. the Lat. un-de-viginti, duo-de-triginta: forty-five was called 'half the fifth ten,' and so on, as will best be seen from the references below; and so it goes on to 'one hundred and twenty,' for in Icel. a hundred means the duodecimal hundred. In the 14th century (in deeds) 'tigr' began to lose its character of a substantive, e. g. þrjátígr, fimtígr ..., or þrjátígi, fimtígi (used indecl.), whence at last the mod. þrjátíu, fjörutíu, fimtíu ..., the tíu being a contracted form from the acc. pl. tigu. At the same time hundred and þúsund became indecl. adjectives, e. g. þrjátíu, þrjúhundrað, þrjúþúsund skipum, for the old þrem tígum hundruðum, þúsundum skipa.

S.); or the word tigr was altogether discarded, and replaced by skor or sneis (Engl. score, Dan. snees). As in vellums the numbers are mostly represented by Roman figures, and abbreviations used, the editions cannot in these cases be implicitly relied on; the same is the case with old texts preserved in mod. paper transcripts.

TIL, prep. with gen. As to this particle, the two branches of the Teutonic family vary: all the South Teut., including the Goth., present the form without the final l; Goth. du (qs. tu) = πρός, els; A. S., Hel, Old Fris. te, to; North. E. te; Engl. to; Dutch te, toe; O. H. G. zi, za, zuo; Germ. zu; Old Frank. to, te, ti; while the Northerners add the l, as Dan., Swed., North. E. and Scot. til; the Swedes double the l, till. That til is the truer form is seen from rhymes, til vilja, Vigl.: on the other hand, mod. province. Norse and Swedish drop the l, thus te, Ivar Aasen, Rietz. The Engl. uses both forms, to, of place, till, of time, of which the latter is no doubt borrowed from the Norse or Danish: til = to is quite common still in Cumberland and other North. E. counties, 'to gang til Carlisle,' etc.; a single instance of the form til is said to exist in an old Northumbrian vellum. Both forms, to and til, are, we believe, identical, the latter being a compound particle, ti-l, althot the origin of the l has not as yet been made out. The uncompound particle ti is not entirely unknown in the Scandinavian, for it has been preserved in the compds mikils-ti, hölz-ti, unz-t, qq. v. Partic. even brief monosyllabic ones, often turn out to be compds, as e. g. (conj.), or the suffixed verbal negative; the prep. 'til' therefore is more akin to the Germ. noun ziel than is 'ok' (and) to ok (a yok. the apparent similarity in sense is in both cases merely accidental).

The passages quoted all refer to Iceland, except two or three to the Orkneys, and one to Norway, viz. torfmenn. In a country bare or stripped of wood, turf plays an important part in husbandry, as sod for buildings and fencing, and as peat for fuel. In the Orkneys the Norse earl Einar got the soubriquet of 'Turf-Einar' (Torf-Einarr) for having taught the Norsemen to dig peat (having probably learnt it himself from the Gaelic tribes in Scotland); the place was hence called Torf-næs, Orkn. The digging of peat in the poem Rígsmaðr is one of the many proofs of the birthplace of that poem. The only passage referring to Norway is that cited under torfmenn, a peat-man (see B), unless the legislator here specially had in mind the Norsemen of the Orkneys who, at that time, were an integral part of the Norse kingdom, without a special code of laws.

UNDORN, m. (not n. as stated in Lex. Poët.), also spelt undurn and undarn, see the references below: [this word occurs in all ancient Teut. languages; Ulf. undaurni-mats or undurn-meat = δαισμον, Luke xiv. 12; A. S. undern; Hel. undorn; O. H. G. untarn. Afterwards it was disused in writing, but in provincial dialects it still survives in all Teutonic countries, Scandinavia, Germany (Bavaria, the Rhine), England (Cumberland, Yorkshire), everywhere, except in Iceland, where, strange to say, it is unknown in speech as well as in writing; thus, Swed. undan, undarn, unden; in Norway undaaln; Bavaria untarn (Schmeller); Fris. ounern; provinc. Engl. orndorns, cunder (Brockett); in all these dialects it means a middle-meal, a kind of lunch, taken either in the afternoon at three o'clock (this seems to be the prevailing sense, at least in Scandinavia), or in the forenoon at nine: even a verb has been formed, thus in Sweden sova und is to take a nap at lunch-time, at midday (Rietz); in the Rhine country undern is said of cattle lying down at midday (Schmeller).]

B. USAGE.—In old Icel. or Norse writers the word occurs five times, thrice in poets, twice in prose; the original sense was undoubtedly a time of the day, either mid-afternoon, i. e. three o'clock P. M., or mid-forenoon, i. e. nine o'clock A. M., the sense of food being a derived one (like mál, q. v.).

I. mid-afternoon, answering to the nones of eccl. writers; morgin hétu ok miðjan dag, undorn ok aptan, they called morning and midday, 'undorn' and evening, Vsp. 6 (undurn, H. l. c.), where undorn is placed midway between noon and eve.

2. mid-forenoon; um morguninn at undurni, in the morning at undurn time,

O. H. L. 65; þá bringt er til miðs-morguns, ok hafa unninn eiðinn fyrr en bringi at undurn (dat.) at Kristi-kirkju, when it rings at mid-morning time, and shall have taken the oath ere the bells at Christ's kirk ring at undurn, N. G. L. i. 308.

II. a meal; hjuggu vér undurn frekum vargi, we carved a meal for the greedy wolf, i. e. we slew many in the battle, Km. 2; örn drekkr undurn, the eagle drinks undurn, Edda 101 (in a verse of about 1030 A. D.), the various readings (undranar and undjarn) shew that the transcribers did not understand the word. In the Icel. day-marks only nófn (q. v.) is of eccl. Lat. origin; may not undurn be the old heathen term which was displaced by that word? the passage in Vsp. favours this suggestion.

II, in poets, wolves are the 'steeds' on which witches ride through the air during the night, Edda. At night wizards were supposed to change their shape, hence the nickname kv úlfir, evening wolf, of a were-wolf; in Icel. the fretful mood caused sleepiness in the evening is called kveld-úlfir; thus the ditty, Kveld er kominn hér / kunnigir innan gátta / sólin lífr sýnisk mér / senn er að háttá, Icel. Almanack 1870; or, Kveld-úlfir er kominn í kerling mína, the evening wolf has entered my child, a lullaby, Sveinb. Egilss. ## V

V (vaff), the twenty-second letter of the alphabet, was by the ancients called vend, q. v. = A. S. wen, whence Icel. vindandi, q. v.; like u, it represented by V in the Runes; in old vellums by Ů, a form borrowed from the A. S.; later by v or u, according to the Latin usage. The Icel. v answers etymologically to Engl. and Germ. w (not v), but the form is little used, though not quite unknown in Icel. vellums.

B. PRONUNCIATION, CHANGES.—The v is now sounded in Icel. in English, by a slight touch of the lip and teeth (not like the Sou. German, with both lips). It is said (Rietz) that a w or double v still sounded in a remote Swedish county (Dalarna), and the opinion of English phonetic philologists is that the English w represents the v of Teutonic value of that letter, which has since been lost all over the Continent, as well as in Iceland. The Icelandic formation of words goes far to prove that the old Scandinavian v was a semi-vowel, and not a full consonant as it is now:

1. traces are found of v alliterating with vowel; on an old Runic stone (of the 10th century?) in the island Öland (off the coast of Schonen) we read—Vandils jörmungruna u-grandari (v, i, and u making the three staves). In verses which have passed through Icelandic oral tradition, alliteration like this could hardly have survived, except in a very few cases (there are, however, some such, svaf vætr Freyja átta nóttum, þkv. 28; Óðinn á jarla þá er val falla, Hbl. 24; önu verr, Ls. 36, cp. Hm. 22); but on the Runic stone the words still remain as they were first engraved.

2. the frequent 'vocalisations' involving the loss of v, which is indeed the most mutab of all letters:

a. ve, vi change into y, vá into ó: a v cannot be sounded before a u-vowel, viz. before o, ú, á, y, æ, ø; countless instances of this are to be found under the heads of v, dv-, hv-, kv-, sv-, tv-, þv- cp. as specimens the tenses of verbs, vaða, valda, vaxa, vefa, sofa, kom: vinna, vinna, svimma, sveilla, vella, velta, verpa, verða, hverfa, sveita, svelfa, sverfa, þverra, sveigja, þvá, sverja; and also hváll and höll, hvi and hót, ván and ón, váru and óru, kvef and kóf, kaf, kœfa, svartr an sorti surtr syrtu, verk and yrkja orka.

þ. more rarely, before other vowels, as, þeita for þveita, silungr for svilungr, hika for hvika, ska for skvak, þi and þvi.

γ. v and j interchange, as in hjól for hve sjót for sveit, skjal for skfal, jurt for vurt, jartegn for vartegn, hver for hjarni; in verbal inflexions, -va into -ja, as byggva into byggja syngva into syngja.

δ. in a few words the v has been saved by change in the following vowel, as in verk, cp. A. S. weorc, virkr for vykr virgull (a halter, Goth. uurgils), væðr and œðr, Svænsk Skenskr.

for the loss of v before a u-vowel see the introduction to the letter Ó, U, Y, Æ, Ö; so in parts of England and in Scotland at the present day men say ool for wool.

ζ. in a few other words initial v is dropped when in compds, vegr in Nor-egr, cinn-ig, hinn-ig, þann-ig, hvern-ig; vang in kaup-angr, Harð-angr; völlr in þreskj-öldr; valdr in Arn-aldr, Har-aldr; verðr in dög-urðr; vindr in Ön-undr; vin in Björg-yn; vér or veir in þyri, qs. þór-vé, and in Dan. Odens-e.

η. again u has changed into v in várr qs. úrr, órr, A. S. úre, Engl. our, and in vesall qs. usal (see várr and vesall).

II. changes of later date, in the 14th and 15th centuries, or somewhat earlier,—old Icel. vá was turned into vó and at last into vo; svá, svó, svo; vár, vór, vor; tvá, tvó, tvo; ván, von; vápn, vópn, vóp; vátr, vótr, votr; váði, vóði, vóði; kváma, koma: the old vá is proved by rhymes, as vátr and gráta svá and á; that this vá did not change immediately into the present vo, but passed through an intermediate vó, is shown by rhymes in poems of the 14th and 15th centuries; e.g. vórr and þórr, Skíða R. 47. 70, 119, 181; stór, vór, 69; vóðinn, Óðinn, 109; vótt (testem), vórt, 122; góma, kvóma, Völs. R. 199; vórr, stórr, 212; stórr, hvórr, 248: the vo still remains in vóru (erant), although short o in voru is rapidly displacing the old long vowel.

This later change of vá into vó, compared with the old dropping of the v whenever it came in contact with a u or o, shews that at the time when it took place (the 14th century), v cannot any longer have had the same sound as it had five or six centuries before, when the great and systematic vocalisation of it took place.

In mod. Icel. v has even reappeared in a few, especially verbal, forms (where people are still conscious of the lost v), so that Icel. now say huvfrí, hvorfinn, hvyrfi (from hverfa); so also, but esp. in later vellums, less in speech, the forms vurðr, vorðinn, vultu, vundu, vorpið, etc., from verða, velta, vinda, verpa; cp. also the mod. sound of the word Guð: again, in words like ull, úlfr, orð, una, etc., a restoration was impossible, all remembrance of the v having been lost for a thousand years; but phonetically, since v became a labial consonant, an Icelander might and could say vull, vúlfr, vorka, vorð, etc., just as well as von, vor, votr.

III. for the dropping of v before r (and l) see the introduction to the letter R (as in rangr = Engl. wrong): it is doubtful whether Icel. vág-rek (= a wreck, flotsom) bears any relation to vágr (a wave): the v may here have been saved by means of a false etymology, vagrek for vrak.

2. in a few cases an aspirate (b) has been substituted for an original w, e.g. Icel. hreiðr (a nest), cp.

Engl. wreath, Goth. wriþus; Icel. hrista, akin to Engl. wrist, Dan. riste; Icel. hrekja, akin to A.S. wreacan, Engl. wreck; Icel. hrina, akin to Dan. wrinke, and perhaps a few more words. 3. in still fewer instances the r has fallen out, the w or v remaining; these words are veita (to trench), veiting (a trench, drainage), for vreita, vreiting (akin to writa); veina (II) = veina; and lastly, vá for vrá (a cabin).

IV. an interchange of v and f occurs in a few instances, e. g. ái-fangi, áfangi, s. ái-vangr; in var-nagli and far-nagli; in varinn and farinn, see fara v. VI. þ; in válgir and þálgir. 2. in inflexive syllables, like örfar, þjófar, böfni (ör, snjó, bö), and the like, the change of v into f is etymologically erroneous, but phonetically indifferent, final or medial f being one in sound with v.

V. for the v or u as the cause of vowel change, see Gramm. p. xxix. 2. it is dropped in inflexions of many words, such as in mórr, böð, stöð, dögg, högg, böl, öl, söl, sjör, njórr, mjöl, kjót, hey, sær, snær, fræ, bygg, lyng; adj. hár, mjórr, þjókr, þökk, röskr, glöggr, etc.

Many of the preceding phenomena (esp. in I. and III) could not possibly be accounted for, unless we assumed that, at some early time, when those changes took place, the v was sounded, not as a consonant, but as a kind of oo sound, half consonant, half vowel; if so, no sound could answer more nearly to it than the mod. Engl. v, the change may have taken place at a very early date, prob. before the settlement of Icel. Norse words in the Shetland and Orkney dialects point to v in w, e. g. væ = Icel. vágr.

vápŊna-tak, n. [A. S. wæpen-take; Engl. wapentake], a weapon-grasping, a law phrase; in their assemblies the ancients used to express their consent by waving or brandishing their weapons, 'si placuit [sententia] fræneas concutiunt, honoratissimum assensus genus est armis laudare,' Tacit. Germ. ch. 11; 'more Dacorum tela mutuae voluntatis pacto una concusserunt,' Dudo De Moribus et Actis Normannorum, iii. 96; 'collisione armorum et contactu,' Andreas Suneson (Lex Scan.); var Sverri gefit konungs-nafn á þessu átta-fylkna-þingi ok dæmt með vápŊna-taki, Fms. viii. 41; æptu allir upp með vápŊna-taki, at þeir skyldi allir vera útlægir, Hkr. iii. 325, v. l.

2. metaph. a vote or decree, resolution passed at a public assembly; veita göra vápŊnatæk, eiga v. at e-m; skulu þingmenn honum jöðr dæma ok veita honum v. til þess, at hann knegi verja jöðr sína með lögum ok dómi, N. G. L. i. 89; þá eigu býjar-menn at leggja dóm á ok veita v. at, Grág. ii. 409 (referring to Norway); beiddi þess alla er á vöru þinginu, liðsmenn, bændr ok bejar-menn, at þeir skyldi göra v. at því, at dæma með lögum ..., Fms. vii. 293; áttu þeir handfesti ok v. at þessu heiti er konungr mælti fyrir, viii. 55; var þá gört lögtekit, ok átt v. at, at Sveinn konungr skyldi ljósja þann af sonum sínum sem hann vilði til konungs eptir sik í Danmörk, xi. 213; njóti sá váttu sinna ok æsti bændr vápŊnataka, N. G. L. i. 250; þá eigu þingmenn honum með vápŊnataki jöðr at skæta, 96; ef maðr rýfr þann dóm er dæmdr er á alþingi, ok v. er at átt innan Lögréttu ok útan, Js. 7, N. G. L. ii. 190; ok vér saman settum ok samþykktum ok lýst vár þá í Túsbergi fyrir alþingum ok v. á tekitt (resolved) at fyrir lög skyldi dæma ..., iii. 206.

II. in the Icel. parliament (alþingi) the word assumed a peculiar sense, for in the Grág. 'vápŊnatæk' means the breaking up of the session, when the men resumed their weapons, which had been laid aside during the session (see vápŊnaburðr, vápŊn A.); þat skal vera fjórtán nóttum eptir vápŊnatæk, en þat heitir v. er alþýða riðr af alþingi, Hrafn. 19, referring to the middle of the 10th century, where however it may be an anachronism; but in the Grágás and in Icel. of the 12th and 13th centuries it was a standing term, see Grág. passim; eptir vápŊnatæk, i. 80; fjórtán nóttum eptir vápŊnatæk, 123, 194, ii. 178.

III. in that part of England which formed the ancient Denelagu, 'wapentak' or 'wapentag' came to mean a subdivision, answering to 'hundred' in the Saxon shires. Although altered in sense, this word was no doubt imported from the Danish, for in Leges Edvardi Confessoris, ch. 30, the words 'sub lege Anglorum' and 'lingua Anglica' are simply an error of a scribe for Danorum, Danica, for 'taka' is not A. S., but Norse, see Konrad Maurer, Germania xiv. 317 sqq.

G. wär, Germ. wabr, Lat. verus]:—a pledge, troth, plight; the word is obsolete, and only occurs in the following references,—Helgi ok Svafa plighted their faith to one another, and loved each other much, Sæm.; einka-mál er veita sín á milli konur ok karlar, því heita þau mál várár, Edda 19; leggit Mjölni í meyrar-knæ, vígit okkr saman várár-hendi, join us with a wedding-band, þkv.; þat ræð ek þér at þú trúir aldri várár vargdropa, Sdm.; hann lagði sitt mál í kné honum ok seldi várár, Fms. ix. 432 (in a verse). 2. the sing. only occurs in Vár, the name of one of the goddesses, Edda (cp. væringi); no doubt from várár. vára-vargr, m. a truce-breaker, Sdm.

H. L. 82; með v., B. K. 107.

VÁRR, vár, várt, mod. vor, a possess. pron. This word has undergone several changes, starting from an original form uns, Goth. unsar, which was contracted into ús, cp. órir, p. 469; next the s changed into r (as in vera, heyra, eyra, járni), thus it became úrr or ór-r, cp. A. S. úre, Engl. our; lastly, the initial vowel was turned into the cognate consonant v, prob. from being confounded with the personal pronoun vér. The old poets seem only to know the vowel form, as is always seen in alliteration, Vfm. 4, 7, Hým. 33, Hkv. Hjörv. 23; and so in rhymes, stórr, órar, Kormak. Thoroddr cites this form, órar eru ú-rækðir órar; and the earliest vellums use it throughout. About A. D. 1200 várr begins to appear, an innovation prob. imported from abroad; thus in Clem. S. (Arna-Magn. 645), p. 147, 'ór', 'órum', six times (ll. 1, 4, 9, 12, 13, 28), but 'várra', 'vár', twice (ll. 6, 25); in a few poems of the 12th century, preserved in late vellums, the spelling is 'vórr', whereas the alliteration and rhyme demand ó, e. g. Líkn. 24, Harms. 53, 54, 58; in Ls. 52 'vömminn vár' is an exception and otherwise corrupt, for 'vár' could not have existed at the time when that poem was composed. In this way the modern várr arose, being quite peculiar to the Scandinavian [Dan. vor, Swed. vår; whereas Goth. unsar, Germ. unser, answer to the obsolete Ícel. óssir; and A. S. úre, Engl. our, answer to early Ícel. órr]:—our.

A. CHANGES AND FORMS.—Vera is an anomalous verb, which has undergone several changes:

I. by changing s to r; of the older form there occur, the infin. vesa, pres. es, pret. vas, vast (vastu), vas; pres. subj. vesi; imperat. ves, MS. 623. 25. l. 14, 645. 61. l. 33, 677.

40. l. 38; vestu, 623. 25. Post. (Unger) 129. l. 27, 229. l. 12; vesum Hom. (Arna-Magn. 237) p. 214. l. 8; pres. indic. 2nd pers. est, Glúm. 372; 3rd pers. es; but no traces remain of the older form in pret. plur. indic. and subj. (váru væri, never vásu væsi). Rhymes in poets at the spelling of the oldest extant poems shew that the s form alone existed in Icel. down to about the end of the 12th century, the time of Snorri Sturluson, when the modern forms crept in probably from Norway, for there the change seems to have taken place a century or earlier; the old Norse vellums (written in Norway or by Norsemen) are distinguished from the Icel. by their constant use of the r: the phrase 'at upp vesandi sólu,' in N. G. L. i. 4, being the only instance of the s form in all the Norse vellums. The earliest instances extant of rhyme to the r form are, the Ht. of Rögnvald, earl of the Orkney; he was a native of Norway, born about A. D. 1100, and the poem was composed about A. D. 1145; another instance is 'vara, fara' in Fm. vii. 185, in a poem about A. D. 1140, written by an Icelander who lived in Norway the greater part of his life, the rhyme is therefore Norwegianism. The first instance in an Icel. poem is in the Ht. of Snorri A. D. 1222. Instances from poets, Hallfred, Sighvat, Arnórr, and coet. poets; vesa, vísi; sás með Sygna ræsi; þági vas sem þessum; vask Röms í básk; vastu, kosta; vas fyrir Mikkjals-messu; nú es um ver þan er vísi; bráskat þat dægr báski: from A. D. 1100–1150, Geisli, P. etc., svás, ræsi; esat, risnu; vasa, tysvar; vestu, freistni; vestu, trausti on the other hand, in the poem of earl Rögnvald, vera, skera; gera, ver; var, skar (twice): from later Icel. poems it is sufficient to note, erð fyrðum; erði, hjarta; verði, forðast, Leidarv. etc. This may sometimes serve as a test, e. g. var ek nær viðr-eign þeirra, Grett., and skap-ke saman vera, Gísl., are impossible in the mouth of poets of the early Sa. time; the verses of both these Sagas are a later composition.

2. to the spelling of the MSS.,—the oldest (the Arna-Magn. 677, the Elo 674, the Ib. etc.) use the s throughout: vellums of the next period about A. D. 1200 (e. g. Arna-Magn. 623 and 645), use the later for sparingly, even the second hand in the Reykhóts máldagi gives 'es,' 'er.' Again, in the vellums of the middle of the 13th century, such as the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm., the Grág., and the Mork., the mod. spellings have entirely got the better of the old, and an 'es' only creeps in, as unawares, from an older copy. Of the poetical literature, the Pd. also has been preserved in a copy old enough to retain the s; all the rhymes have the modernised spelling, even in the rhymed syllables quoted about such too is the case with the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm. Edda; but had the vellum been but fifty or sixty years older, the forms vesa, es, vas, etc. would now be the established spelling in Editions of these poems.

on Danish and Swedish Runic stones, the 3rd pers. pret. sing. is a word of frequent occurrence; the best Danish monuments have vas, e. g. vas farinn vestr, Thorsen 93 and 101 (on a stone of the reign of Sweyn, died A. D. 1014). In Sweden the great majority present the later form: the so-called Ingvar stones are chronologically certain, belong to the middle of the 11th century (Ingvar died A. D. 1039); there we read, 'vas' (twice), 'varinn' (once), 'var' (thrice, being twice spelt with h, once with h): this shews that about this time in Sweden the later or more modern form had begun to be used, but that the old was remembered.

(Unger) 18 (vesæla, v. l.); vesalir, Al. 96, l. 18; this regular declension is still in full use in Icel. speech, only not contracted, e. g. vesall, vesalíngi, vesalir (not veslir); vesæla, Fas. i. 49 (paper MS.): so also in the compar. either vesalli, Greg. 37, Sd. 188; vesalla, 656 C. 34; vesalstr, Kormak, Bjarn. (in a verse); but veslari, Barl. 23 (vesalli, v. l.) Ves is the root, -all the inflexive syllable; the form vesall is a later form, from a false etymology, as if from vé-privative, and sall, bappy. The origin of vesall is dubious, the radical s is against a derivation from the compar. verri, Goth. wairiza; and the short vowel is against deriving it from vás, vés, q. v. The true etymology, we believe, is that vesall stands for 'usall,' being derived from the prep. ur, or-, in its ancient form us; Goth. us; Icel. ur-, ör-,; this etymology is confirmed by form and sense alike; the old phrases, alls vesall (omnium expers), vesall eigi (proprii expers), were originally alliterative phrases; in Hm. 22, 69, vesall is made to alliterate with a vowel (vesall maðr ok illa skapi ... erat maðr alls vesall þótt hann sá illa heili); usall is actually found written in Nj. (Lat.) 264, v. l.; the change of us into ves may be illustrated by the case of várr (q. v.); it is the opposite to that vocalisation of v which so frequently takes place. As to sense, vesall originally meant bereft, destitute of, = Lat. expers; and is followed by a genitive: [the Dan. form is usel, less right usel].

VETR, m., gen. vetrar, dat. vetri; pl., nom. and acc. vetr, gen. vetrar. dat. vetrum: it was an assimilated form anciently written vetr or vittr, qs. viutr; vitrar or vittrar (gen.), Post. (Unger) 233; vetr is freq., esp. in N. G. L.; double consonants are in vellums difficult to distinguish from single, and so it may well have been the current form, although the Edd. give the mod. form (vetr): in poets we find, mitt sextingu vittra. Glúm. (in a verse): vittr occurs in Icel. ballads of the 15th century, see Þryml., Völs. R., Skáld H. R., but here it is merely an imitation of Danish originals, for the word in Icel. always took the assimilated form: [Ulfr. vintrus = χειμών and έρος; A. S., Engl., and Germ. winter; Dan.-Swed. vinter, for the assimilation of nt into tt did not prevail in the south of Scandinavia, see Gramm. p. xxx, col. 1.]

A. A winter; winter, like summer (see sumar), is a calendary period, containing 180 days, or six months of thirty days; the winter begins on the Saturday next before St. Luke's day (old style), or on St. Luke's day, if a Saturday. In the Gregorian style, for 1872 and 1873, vetrardagr fyrsti, the first winter day = Saturday, the 26th of Oct.; miðr vetr, mid-winter, the 24th of Jan.; síðasti vetrar dagr, the last winter day = Wednesday, the 23rd of April; Laugardagr skal fyrsti vera í vetri, en þaðan skal vera sex mánuðr þrjátígi náttu til sumars, K. þ. K. 166; vetr kemr laugardaginn er næstur er fyrir Lúkas-messu, en hana sjálfa ef hlauðr ferr eptir, Rb. 490; Drottins-dagr inn fyrsti í vetri skal vera inn þriðri frá messu-degi Cosmi ok Damiani, Rb. 434: as a general term, í vetr, this winter, Nj. 4; hafa blót hvern vetr, Ó. II. = a year; as in A. S. days were reckoned by nights (see nótt), so years were counted by winters; in Ulflás (Matt. ix. 20, Luke ii. 42, viii. 42) έρος is rendered by vintrus; and so at present in Icel., a person is so many 'winters' old; tólf vetra gamall, K. þ. K. 134; sextán vetra gamall, Grág. i. 197; and ellipt. leaving out gamall, tólf vetra, Fms. i. 8; tíu vetrum síðarr, 61; sex tígi vetra konungur, Eg. 367; sjau vetr ena ársömu, Ver. 17 (of king Pharaoh's dream); þeirra var vetrar-munnr, difference in age of one year, Dropl. 7; for more references, see tigr B.

Dan. saying, 'vise en vinter-vejen,' to shew one the winter-way, i.e. leave one in the cold. 2. astron. the milky way, in Icel. called vetrar-braut, undoubtedly from old heathen times, although the word happens not to occur in old writers; Icel. weather-prophets use in the autumn to forecast the course of the winter, by the appearance of the milky-way; this is evidently a very old custom, whence probably the name, for in old times fortune-telling used to take place at the great autumnal feasts and sacrifices, see the references s. v. völvu.

The ancient Scandinavians and Teutons in heathen times seem to have counted the year by pentads, called fimt, as has already been recalled s. v. fimt (p. 153), to which may be added the authority of the Prof. Schlegel of Copenhagen in a notice of 1825, mentioned in Lex. i. l. p. 753. The time when the Scandinavians changed their system was unknown; it would seem that in Icel. 'weeks' were already in the middle of the 10th century, could we but trust the record of the 4. as authentic in its details.

víking, f. a freebooting voyage, piracy; see víkingr. In heathen days it was usual for young men of distinction, before settling down, to make a warlike expedition to foreign parts, this voyage was called 'víking', and was part of a man's education like the grand tour in modern times; hence the saying in the old Saga,—"when I was young and on my voyage (víking), but now I am old and decrepit;" so a son begs his father to give him a 'langskip', that he may set out on a 'víking', cp. the scene of the young Egil and his mother Bera, and the reference Fms. i. 69; see B. The custom was common among Teutonic tribes, and is mentioned by Caesar B. G. vi. ch. 23 (latrocinia nullam habent infamiam, quae extra fines cujusque civitatis fiunt, sqq.), only there it is a foray on land; (cp. the mod. American filibustering.)

víkingr, m. a freebooter, rover, pirate, but in the Icel. Sagas used specially of the bands of Scandinavian warriors, who during the 9th and 10th centuries harried the British Isles and Normandy: the word is peculiarly Norse, for although it occurs in A. S. in the poem Byrnoth (six or seven times), it is there evidently to be regarded as a Norse word; and prob. so too in the poem 'Exodus,' in the words ronðas bærun sæ-vingas, over saltne mere; lastly, in 'Widsith,' as the name of a people, and Líðvingas (=Liðungar? q.v.): The word 'víkingr' is thought to be derived from vík (a bay), from their haunting the bays, creeks, and fjords;—or it means 'the men from the fjords,' the coincidence that the old Irish called the Norsemen 'Lochlannoch,' and Norway 'Loebnan,' is curious.

[Germ. weise; Dan. vis], a strophe, stanza; kveða vísu, Nj. 12; hann orti kvæði ok eru þessar vísur í, Fms. v. 108; vísu lengd, the length of a stanza, Edda (Ht.) i. 606, 656; referring to the repetition of verses as a means of measuring time (minutes), Fs. (Vd. ch. 26); lausa-vísa, a ditty; nýð-vísa, sǫng-vísa; höldar danza harla snart, þá heyrst vísa min, a ditty; as the names of shorter poems, as, Nesja-vísa, Austrfarar-vísur, by Sighvat; Vísna-bók, a book of lays. Unlike the old Greek epics, as well as the poems of the Saxon Beowulf, all ancient Northern poetry is in strophic lays. Four sets of alliteration make a verse (vísa), two a half strophe, vísu-helmingr, Edda (Ht.) i. 610, or half vísa, Grág. ii. 148; one set a quarter of a verse (vísu-sjórdungr); each alliterative set being again divided into two halves, called vísu-órð, a word or sentence, Edda (Ht.) i. 596, cp. Hallfr. S. ch. 6 (Fs. 96, 97); thus 'fastorðr skylji fyrða | fengsæll vera þengill' is an alliterative set. The velums give verses in unbroken lines, but in modern print each alliterative set is divided into two lines; this may do for metres of the drótt-kvæð kind, with two rhyming syllables in each vísu-órð; but in the brief kvíðu-háttir (the metre of the Vsp.) each alliterative set should, for the sake of the flow of the verse, be printed in one line, thus, Hljóðs bið ek allar helgar kindir | meiri ok minni mögu Heimdalar; for a pause only follows between each pair of sets, but none between the sub-staves and the head-stave. This plan is that advocated by Jacob Grimm: the other, commonly followed in the Editions, chops the verse into—hljóðs bið ek allar | helgar kindir | meiri ok minni | mögu Heimdalar.

VÖLVA, u, f., also spelt völfa, gen. völu, pl. völur; völfa, or also völfr or völvur; gen. pl. does not occur; the nom. Vala is erroneous: [the etymology as well as the origin of this word is uncertain; but may not the Norse Völva and the Gr. σιβυλλα be relations? the identity in sense at least is very striking; the Gr. word first occurs in Aristoph., and then in Plato; may it not have been adopted from some Scythian tribe, for a word like this, if Greek, could hardly fail to occur in Homer? in völva an initial s, we suppose, has been lost (qs. svölva); in the Greek the Y would be an inserted vowel]:—a prophetess, sibyl, wise woman; völva, seiðkona, spákona (qq. v.) are synonymous. The ancient Sagas contain many remarkable records of the heathen wise-women or sibyls, who were held in honour and reverence; at the great feasts and sacrifices in the autumn, the völva (often a woman of rank) went with her troop of maidens through the country, where she, so to say, crowned the feast; she was seated on a high seat (seiðhjallr) in the hall, where she wrought her spells and sang her 'weird-songs' (varðlökur), after which the guests went past her one by one, and she told each his fate, or whatever else one wanted to know, e. g. the course of the coming winter and the like. The former part of the Völuspá is evidently conceived as the inspired song of a völva, seated on her high seat, and addressing Odin, while the gods listen to her words; and the latter part of the poem appears to be a kind of necromancy, or the raising of a dead völva, as also is the lay Vegtamskvíða; sú kona var þar í bygð er þorbjörg hét, ok var kölluð lítill völva, hún hafði áttar sér níu systir, ok vóru allar spákonur, en hún var ein þá á lífi, þar var háttir þorbjörgar um vetrar, at hún fór á veizlur ok buðu þeir menn henni mest heim er forvitni var á at vita forlög sín eða árfærd, þorf. Karl. Names of such wise women, Gróa völva, Edda; Heimlaug völva, Gullþ.; Heiðr völva, Landn. 173; Huldr völva, Yngl. S., Hkr. i. 21; to which add the 'Weleda' of Tacitus: class. passages are þorf. ## X

(ex) commonly represents ks, gs (as in other languages), where both ers are radical, thus, ax, fax, lax, sax, öx, vax, vaxa, sex, uxi, vöxtr, ; jaxl, öxl, qq. v.; but hugsa from hugr; lags from lag; loks from
; oks (gen.) from ok (jugum); rakstr, bakstr, from raka, baka, etc.
e vellums use x in other cases, e.g. sterxti=sterksti, the strongest,
m. 146; tax (gen.) from tak, N. G. L. i. 47; dúx=dúks, Clem. 127, ; lox=loks, 134; vitreix=vitreiks, 142; almattex=almáttigs, 133; la=vísla, N. G. L. i. 9; fulltinx=fulltings, O. H. 242; vaxcliga= vkliga, Mork. 178; lyx=lyksk, Ib. (fine); fexk=fékksk (from fá verb), Bs. i. 351; ux=ups (q. v.), N. G. L. i. 368: or again, vegs= (the verb), Hm. 119; lags=lax (salmon), Sæm. 212, l. 20 (Bugge); =dags, N. G. L. i. 23; but on the whole the vellums distinguish gs, and x, shewing the pronunciation in older times to have been more inct than it is now, when all three forms (gs, ks, x) represent the e sound, no matter whether the s be inflexive or not; thus in com-modern spelling, both hugsa and huxa, dags and dax are used at dom. In vellums x and r are very much alike; hence in the well-own passage in Vsp. the misreading of sarrum (sordibus) for sarrum sibus), in all Editions, until Prof. Bugge noticed the stroke underneath line in Cod. Reg.

Y—Ý

Y is of later origin, and only found in derived words, being an 'umlaut' from u, (y from u, ý from ú); in the Runic alphabet it is placed at the end, and marked ʁ, see Skálda (ii. 72); it is there called yr, a yew-tree,—yr er vetrgræust víða, 'yr' is the 'winter-greenest of trees, Runic poem.

B. The independent sound of y, ý is now lost in Icel., being replaced respectively by the sounds i, í, whereas in mod. Dan., Swed. and Norse the old sound has been preserved; the old Icel. MSS., as well as the rhymes in old poems, distinguish both, except in a few instances, see Gramm. p. xxxv, col. 2 (7). The change from y to i seems to have began about the time of the Reformation, but in the first printed books, e.g. the N. T. of 1540 and the Bible of 1584, the distinction is still well kept, the remembrance of the old form and etymology being then still alive. Later, the writing became very confused. Some transcribers of the 17th century, e.g. Ketil Jörundsson, a noted copier of old vellums, took the better course, never writing y at all, but i throughout; the same may be observed in the handwriting of some Icelanders down to the present day. In printed books of the 17th and 18th centuries the confusion is great, till of late an accurate spelling has been re-established, though even this fails in a few words; e.g. the ancients spell þrysvar, gymbr, qq. v.; the mod. þrisvar, gimbr. The poets of the last three centuries make i and y, ei and ey rhyme indifferently, according to the usage of the living tongue. II. an initial v is dropped before y, as in yndi, yrði, yrkja, etc.

Z

Z (zet). The ancient language had two sibilant sounds, s and z, which the z never stands at the beginning of a word, but is merely assimilated to a preceding dental, in the combinations ld, nd, nn, ll, gð, t, see Gramm. p. xxxvi, col. 1. β: its use in ancient vellums is extensive:

1. in genitives; trollz, illz (illr), allz (allr), he Skm. 32; gullz, 22; ellz = elds, botz = botns, Gkv. 3. 9; vatz and = vatns; keyptz, Hm. 107; mótz, Knútz or Knúz = Knúts; vitz (v orðz, sverðz, barðz, borðz, garðz, harðz, langbarz, Gkv. 2. 19; Hjörva Hkv. Hjörv. 19; morðz, bragðz, flagðz, Frissb. 107, l. 19; or also: Hm. 141, etc.; prestz, Christz, passim; tjalz, Edda ii. 314; landz or l. passim; fjallz, Edda ii. 339; but tjalldz, 527; elldz, vindz, 317, 318; gar 525; brandz, 529; valldz, 338; sverðz, borðz, 331; but borz, 462, l. garz, 529; loptz, 341 (twice); but lopz, 317; netz, 327; gautz, 3. hugskozins, Post. 251.

2. in special forms; stendz, Grág. i. 501 (fr standa); stennz, id., Ó. H. 143; bitzt from binda, Post. (Unger) 154; vizt, vatzk from vinda (II), q. v.; but vinnz from vinna, q. v.; biz = bi from biðja, Post. (Unger) 240: indeed bizt, bazt may be both from bi and biðja: bletza and blezza (to bless), hölltzi, qq. v.; beztr or baztr, best; œtr = œðstr; patz and paz = pat es, Sem. passim; patztu, Am. hvártz = hvárt es, Grág. (Kb.) i. 161: even mz (or mzt) for the older þóttumz, Gkv. 2. 37.

3. when the z is due to a t following it; in reflex. -sk is the oldest form, whence -zt, -z, -zst; andask, andast, and andastz: in the superl. zt, eðztir, Frissb. 78, l. 20; harðazta, l. 33; snazta, l. 16; rikaztr, 207, l. 18; friðuzt, l. 34; hagazt, Vkv. 18; grimmazt Edda ii. 530; máttkaztr, 280; hvitaz, 267; but st is the usual form, the sárastr, grimmastr, hvassastr, Gh. 17: in Ázt-riðr = Ást-riðr, Ó. H. i. 12.

4. in such words as veizla, gæzla, reizla, leizla, hraezla, gæzl lýzka, æzka, æzli, vitzka or vizka, hirzla, varzla, hanzki, = veizla, l. hirðsla, varðsla, handski, etc.: in reflex. neut. part., thus, hafa bori komizt, farizt, tekizt, fundizt, glazt, sagzt, spurzt, kallazt, dæmzt, át ... (from bera ... eiga): in reflex. 2nd pers. pl. pres. and pret., e. g. segizt, þér sögðuzt, qs. segit-st, sögðut-st, so as to distinguish it from the 3rd pers., þeir sögðut, qs. sögðu-st.

5. Gitzurr or Gizzurr, Þja Özzurr; afraz-kollr, Ó. H. (pref.); huliz-hjálmr; Vitaz-gjafi, q. v.; l. alaðs-festr, Grág. (Kb.) i. 88; viz, see viðr II: in foreign names, Jar leifr, Jariz-karr, Buriz-leifr, Gkv. 2. 19, Fms. vi. The etymology words may often be decided by this; e. g. in beisl, a bridle, beiskr, bið the s of the vellums shews that neither word is derived from bið beiskr is in fact akin to Engl. beestings, Ulf. beist = βύτη, A. S. beos geiska fullr, Hkv. 2. 35, is not from geit, but from geisa: laz or la (p. 376, col. 1) is from Fr. lace, not = Icel. láss: misseri (q. v.) is no relative to miðr, etc.: at lesti, at last, being spelt with s, not z, is not related to latr, but derived from leistr = a cobbler's last, at lesti = Lat. in calce, see M Sweet's Ed. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. 474: again, vaztir is akin to va = vatn: exceptional cases,—vissi, pret. from vita, and sess, a seat.

6. after a single dental (unless it be t) s, not z, is written; thus, gen. Guf boðs, brauðs, auðs, göðs, óðs, vaðs, liðs, öls, fals, háls, frjáls, vins, eins, etc. passim: z is quite exceptional, e. g. liðz, Frissb. 106, ll. 16, 33 (but lið Hbl. 33, Am. 43): so also after rn, rl, nl, rn, fn, gn, barns, Clem. 134 karls, Hkv. 2. 2; jarls, Hm. 97; hrafnz, segls, regns, tungls (regns, Edda ii. 340). The vellums are very irregular in the distinction of a single or double consonant, but the sibilant used shews the true form of the word in 'Odz Colssonar', Ó. H. (pref.) l. 11, the z and s shew the names to be Oddr and Kolr, not Öðr, Kollr; in a vellum els would be gen. of él, ellz or eldr; in grunz, Edda ii. 287; lunz, 317; hlunz, ranz, lanz, 333; el Post. (Unger) 234; golz, 225, l. 23; odz, Ó. H. (pref.), l. 11; alz, etc. the z shews that though there is only one n, l, etc. written, they were actually sounded double, grunzz, hlunzz, ranzz, landz, eldz, gollz, oddz allz.

7. the s does not change into z if the word is a compound as, skáld-skapr, vind-svalr, út-suðr, passim; hrið-stjóri, Edda ii. 335 shewing that in ancient times the pronunciation was more distinct than at the present day; the z in orðztir (Edda ii. 344, orztir, 463) shew that the word is qs. orðz-tírr; yet we find such forms as innzigi, Post 238; guðzspjall, 239; ástzamliga, 243; handzceld, Barl.; randzaka, Post 134, l. 29; but rannzaka, l. 14; nauzun = nauðsyn, Skálda 167. 21; nauzun Edda ii. 236; anzvara, annzkti, = andzvara, andzkti, etc.

III. about the 15th century (or earlier) the z sound began to disappear, and took its place, being at present the only sibilant used in Icel. In later vellums the z is therefore either little used or is misapplied, as in the additions by the third hand in the Flatey-book, or it is used to excess as in modern Dutch. In modern spelling, including Editions of Sagas, the z has been disused, except in the instances coming under the rule given in I. 4: yet with exception of ðs, for the moderns write leiðsla, hræðsla, beiðsla, náðst, old leiðla, názt, except in reisla (i. e. reizla) from reida; hirzla qs. hirðsla.

2. zz is sounded as ss, blessa, Gissur, Össur; so also vass, boss, =vatz, botz; even ors, gars, lans, sans, for orz, garz, lanz, sanz (gen. of orð, garðr, land, sandr).

P

P (horn) was adopted from the Runic alphabet; its ancient name was horn (þorn).—þann staf er flestir menn kalla þorn, Skálda (Thorodd) 68, cp. Edda ii. 365,—and it is still so called in Icel.; the ancients also called it 'þurs' (giant), which was originally the name of a magical Rune, intended to cause love-madness, and in the Runic poem it is so called—þurs veldr kvenna kvíllu; but in the poem Skm. 'þurs' means the magical Rune,—'þurs' rist ek þér ok þrjá stafi, 'ergi', 'æði', ok 'þola', Skm. 36. Thorodd proposed to call it 'þé' (like dó, té, bé), Skálda 168. In the Runic inscriptions it is marked þ, seldom þ; the letter is evidently derived from Gr.-Lat., being a Δ or D with the vertical stroke prolonged both ways.

B. SPELLING, PRONUNCIATION, CHANGES.—For the spelling of the ancient vellums see introduction to letter D (p. 93, col. 2). In Icel. there is phonetically a double th sound, as in English, but subject to a different rule; the hard th, marked þ, is only sounded as the initial letter of distinct syllables; whereas the soft th, marked ð, is only sounded as a medial or final; and that the case was the same in olden times, as early as the 12th century, is borne out by the statement of the second grammarian Gramm. p. xv, col. 1), who counts hard th, or þ, among the 'head-letters,' as he calls them, whereas the soft ð he counts among the 'sub-letters' (p. xv, col. 2, ll. 4–6). That the initial th had only one sound in Icelandic is also borne out by the mod. Faroe dialect, which has the closest affinity to the Icelandic; for here the initial þ has, in pronouns and articles as well as in nouns, changed into t, as in ting, tu, teir. But in the rest of Scandinavia the case is different, for there (Dan., Swed., Norse) the initial þ has been changed into d in all particles and pronouns, de, du, der, dem, den, dette, dig, deden, for-di (ti is an exception); whilst, in all other words, it has been changed into t, as in ting, taale, tre, etc., which points to a hard and soft th sound, used not as in Icelandic, but as in modern English. According to the views of a gradual and successive 'laut-verschiebung,' as set forth in Mr. Sweet's essay 'On the Old English D' Appendix I. to Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. 496 sqq.), the Icelandic and the Faroic represent phonetically a later, the early Danish (old Scandinavian and English) an earlier stage in the development of this sound. It is curious to see how in the Faroic the sound has come round to Gr.-Lat. again; thus þróic trir, tu, = Lat. tres, tu, in Dan. tree, but du.

II. In Icelandic a word with initial þ forming the latter part of a compound, or even if spelt separately, is apt to be changed into ð as soon as it loses its full sound, and is pronounced rapidly as an inflexible syllable, the latter part in questions becoming half enclitic, see introduction to letter D, p. 93, col. 2 (C. II). In vellums this is very frequent in the words al-ðingi, Svi-ðið, al-ðýða = alþingi...; so also á-ðingi = áþingi, Js. 39; örvar-ðingi, id.; Vaf-brúðnir, Sæm. (Bugge); hug-ðekkr, O. H. 16, etc.; the pr. names Hall-ðorr, Hall-dóra point to a Hall-ðorr, Hall-dóra = Hall-þorr, Hall-þóra; so also Stein-dórr = Stein-ðórr = Stein-þórr, for a þ could only change into ð through ð; in Arnórr, qs. Arn-þórr, the þ has been dropped (Arn-þórr, Arn-dórr, Arn-órr?); litt-at = litt-þat, hitt-ð-heldr = hitt-þ-heldr, flyttr, make haste, already cited in Run. Gramm.; cp. also the change of the pron. þú into -ðu, -ðu, -tu, -ú, when suffixed. Quite different and much older is the dropping of initial þ (i.e. ð) in the particles enn = ann = þann, Engl. than, and in at = þat, Engl. that, Old Germ. daz: in the pronouns þér, þið, for ér, ið, the þ comes from the termination of the preceding verb. For the rest see the introduction to letter D, to which we may add that in single Icelandic vellum, the later handwriting in Arna-Magn. 645, now published in Post. (Unger) 216–236, is interesting for its uncertain use of þ and ð; at the time it was written, the ð was still a newly adopted letter, and the transcriber uncertain as to its use, so that no conclusion may be drawn from this isolated case; these are the instances,—upp þu, 216. ll. 9, 27, 219. l. 39; skirþr þegar, 217. l. 9; upp þegar, 220. l. 1; blezþu þeim, 217. l. 34; af þeim, 223. l. 10; fyrir þeim, 224. ll. 14, 18; þoþer þeim, 228. l. 19; viþ þá, 218. l. 13, 235. l. 5; þá þáþan, 225. l. 17; af þvi, 219. l. 15, 232. l. 21, 234. l. 11, 235. l. 13; ifer þá, 226. l. 31; firir þá trú, 232. l. 34; frá þér at þu (sic), 226. l. 23; frá þér ef þu (four lines below); ek þiþ þik, 227. l. 17; viþ þik, 236. l. 7; after a comma, þá er rétt, 231. l. 36; ðu laust, 233. l. 32; with nouns and verbs, of þorp ok borgir, 217. l. 35; ok þökkupu, 224. l. 25; firir þys alþýðu, 227. l. 12.

III. The Icel. þ answers to Gr.-Lat. t, see e.g. the root tan (teivus, tendo, tenuis), compared to the Icel. þenja, punnr; þrir = Lat. tres; þrómr = Gr. τέπμα, Lat. terminus; þefr, cp. Lat. tēpidus, etc., see the special words. 2. again, Germ. þ answers to Icel. þ, þing, drei, denken; in a few words the laut-verschiebung is irregular, thus, Engl. night, Icel. þéttir; þurfa = Engl. dare. Only a few words with initial þ have been adopted in later times, such are, þenja, þanki, þrykkja = Germ. denken, ge-danke, drücken; these words were borrowed about the time of the Reformation, probably from German, not Danish, i.e. from words with d; in these words the laut-verschiebung, strange to say, has been duly observed, as if by instinct, which would hardly have been the case had it been borrowed through the Danish t: but in tráss = Germ.

dratzen, mod. Germ. trotzen, Icel. þratta, the true form has not been restored; so also in mod. usage Icelanders are beginning to say tak, tak (= Dan. tak = thanks), unmindful of their own þakka, þakka; t and þ are unsettled in tyrma and þyrma; tolla, see pola (II); trembl and þrembl; þeisti and teista: f and þ interchange in Icel. [Icel. Engl. file; þel and Lat. filius, þel and fiol, and in a few other words; t and þ in trist for þrist.

ÞAGSI, adj., the parent-word of the mod. Dan. tavs (silent) has hitherto not been found in the old Icel. literature; it should be þagsi, but most if not all words of that form were obsolete as early as the 12th and 13th centuries, and have disappeared in mod. Icel., as hugsi, staðsi, heitsi...; we believe it is preserved in the corrupted 'þegn varð' in the transcript of the Ib., where we propose to read, svá at allir menn myndi 'þagsi verða' (= Dan. blive tavse) meðan hann mætti at lögbergi, so that all men would become silent whilst he spoke on the Law-bill, Ib. 7. In an ancient vellum a þi, with the upper end of the s faint or blotted out, and an n or ŋ would be distinguished with difficulty; and as to an Icel. transcriber þagsi was quite an unknown word, while 'þegn,' 'þagn' were familiar syllables, he would choose the latter; the vellum itself was lost soon after the copy had been taken in A. D. 1651. In Rb. (Isl. i. 385) the word has been paraphrased into 'þegja'; see the Academy, vol. i. p. 378.

ÞEIR, þær, þau. This is the plur. of the personal pron., answering to þing, hann, hún, þat; gen. þeira and mod. þeirra; dat. þeim; acc. þá, þær, þau; in mod. speech þau is sounded þaug, which form occurs as early as Run. Gramm. of 1651, and often rhymes in mod. poets with words ending in gi, e. g. flaug, þaug, Bb. 2. 17; [the A. S. uses the forms ðe, ðira, ðim, ði, and so in early South. E., whereas the North. E. has they, thair, thaim; South. E. and Chaucer bi, here, þem, Morris' Specimens, p. xv; Dan. de, deres, early Dan. dera, dat. dem.]

A. They, them, theirs (see Gramm. p. xxi); töluðu þeir mart, ríða þeir leim af þingi; þeir kómu í Fljótslíð, Gunnarr tók vel við þeim; Njáll mælti til þeirra . . . slíkar fortölur hafði hann fyrir þeim, . . . þeir spurðu þær tíðenda, báðu þeir eigi leyna, þær sögðu svá vera skyldu; á þeim hani illa sækjask at vinna oss, . . . vér getum þá eigi með vápnum sóttu, and so in endless instances.

2. a peculiarity of the Icel. is the constant use of the neut. plur. 'þau' as collective for a masc. and fem.; síðan þengu þau inn bæði (i. e. Njáll and Berghora), at hann skyldi breiða yfir þau húðina; börn þeirra þjálfá ok Rösku, ok gördusk þau . . . þá er þau höfðu gengit líta hrið, Edda 28; Ask ok Emblu . . . önd þau né áttu öð þau né höfðu, Vsp.; and so also of things, e. g. þau páll og reka; þau önd og fótr, and so on.

B. Special usages; this pronoun is used collectively before the names of two or more persons, the neuter being used when the persons are of different sexes:

1. where more than one are expressly named; þau Ásgerðr ok Þorstein, they, Asgerd and Thorstein, Eg. 702; þeir tarkaðr ok Þódr, ok Flosi, Nj. 282; börn þeirra Hildigunnar ok Kára, be children of H. and K., id.; synir þeirra Starkaðr ok Hallberu voru eir þorgeirr ok Börkr ok Þorkell, 89; synir hans voru þeir Kolr ok Ottarr ok Haukr, id.; bræðr Hallgerðar voru þeir Þorleikr, faðir Bolla, k Ólafir faðir Kjartans, ok Bárðr, they, Thorleik, Olave, and Bard, 2; þeir þeirra Þorkels föður Brands, ok Þorgils föður míns, Jb. 20 (restored y Maurer; the emendation in the Editions is an error; the passage is parallel to that given above from Nj.); Þórr ok þeir lagsmenn, Thor and they—his followers, Edda 28.

2. ellipt., as it seems, where one part is understood, and not named; in this case the neut. pron. is used whenever the name understood is different in gender; þeim Oddi, to Odd and his men, fms. vi. 379; þeir Vagn, W. and his men; þeir Pálnatöki, P. and his men, xi. 95; þeir Þóroddr, . . . þeim Þóroddi, Hkr. ii. 251; frá skiptum þeirra Þórðar, the dealings of Þórðr (and Björn), fms. iv. 110; þeir feðgar, they, father and son, Nj.; þau Ásgerðr, Asgerd and her son, Eg. 702; vinátta var með þeim ændum þeirra, i. e. between him and their kinsmen, Grett. 134; þeirra æðra, fms. xi. 160; þeir í Orkneyjum, Nj. 270; af þeim (those) fyrir ástan árnar, 210.—This use of the pronoun þeir, þær, þau is peculiar to the old Scand. and Icel. tongue, and is not found in any other Teut. language. We take it to be a remnant from an ancient time when the article was still used detached and not suffixed, being, as in Homeric Greek, used half as a demonstrative pronoun; thus Iliad viii. 457, αἰδ' Ἀθηναίων τε καὶ Ἡρῶν, sounds quite Icel., þær Aþena og Hera; Icel. extend it also to the other cases, þeirra (gen.) Aþenu og Heru, þeim þenu og Heru; cp. also II. xiii. 496, 526; the usage of the neut., as above, seems peculiar to Icel. It is therefore an error to explain 'þeir þóroddr', etc., as if a copula 'ok' had been dropped between the pronoun and the pr. name, þeir 'ok' Þóroddr; it is in fact an elliptical abbreviated version of the usage in B. 1: similar is the use of hann and hún for the sing. (see hann B. II. p. 239, col. 1), and of Gr. ὁ as in Od. xi. 181.

C. For this pronoun as demonstrative, see þat, p. 731.

Icel. þekkja. In the old Norse the sense of 'to think' is still undeveloped, and only appears in the borrowed mod. form þekkja; cp. þykkja.]

ÞESSI, fem. þessi, neut. þetta, a demonstr. pron.

A. THE FORMS.—The Icel., like other Teut. languages, except the Goth., has two demonstr. prons., one simple, sá sú þat, another emphatic or deictic, þessi, þetta (cp. Gr. ὁ ὅδε, Lat. hic and hicce); the latter is a compound word, the particle -si, sometimes changed into -sa, being suffixed to the cases of the simple pronoun; Dr. Egilsson, in Lex. Poët first explained that this suffix was the imperative 'see,' Goth. sai; þess as well as the Engl. this, these, tho-se, is therefore qs. the-see, that-se. The forms vary much: I. the earliest declension is with th suffixed particle, like -gi in ein-gi, q. v., indeclinable; it is mostly s on the Runic stones, where we find the following forms,—dat. þeim-a (baic-ce), Rafn 178; acc. þann-si (bunc-ce), passim; þá-si (banc-ce); plur. þeir-si (bi-ce); dat. þeim-si (his-ce); acc. þá-si (hos-ce); neut. plur. þau-a (baec-ce), passim: of this declension the vellums have only preserved the dat. sing. neut. þvi-sa, and the dat. masc. sing. and plur. þeim-a. On the Runic stones the acc. masc. sing. and plur., the acc. fem. plur., and the acc. neut. plur. are, so to say, standing phrases—to raise 'this stone,' 'these stones,' or 'these kumbils' (neut. plur.), or to carve 'these Runes'; but the other cases can only be assumed from later forms; in the Runic inscriptions they are wanting, because there was no occasion for them: thus þvi-sa and þeim-a are freq. in old Icel. vellums, but are hardly met with in Runes. Even nom. sing. masc. and fem. sá-si (bi-ce) and sú-si (baec-ce) are said to occur in two or three Runic inscriptions.

II. the whole word was next turned into a regular adjective with the inflexion at the end, just like margr from mann-gi, öngtr from ein-gi, in which case the suffix became assimilated to the preceding pronoun, sometimes the inflexion s and sometimes the final letter of the pronoun prevailing; hence arose the forms as given in Gramm. p. xxi: a. the s prevailed in the forms þessi qs. þer-si; in þes-sa; in þessum qs. þeim-sum, þem-sum; runum þimsum (bisee literis) occurs in Rafn 165, but is there erroneously explained; in þessu qs. þvi-sa: acc. plur. þessa qs. þá-sa, þessar qs. þar-sa, þessi qs. þau-si. β. again, the final of the pronoun prevailed in þenna qs. þann-sa, þetta qs. þat-sa; so also in þeim-a, which stands for þeimma, which again is an assimilation for þeim-a or þeim-si.

2. the older form for gen. and dat. sing. fem., as also gen. plur., is bisyllabic (gen. þessa, dat. þessi, gen. plur. þessa); þessar messu, Hom. 41; þessar upp-rásar, Fms. i. 166; i þessi útleðg, 78; af þessi sótt, ix. 390; til þessa saka, Grág. i. 324, and passim; hence, later, þessarrar, þessarri, þessarra; thus, þessarrar, MS. 544 151; þessarri, Sks. 672 B; þessarrar, 786 B, and so in mod. usage. III. a spec. form is þessor (q. v.), formed like nokkorr or engarr, but only used in nom. sing. fem. and nom. acc. neut. plur. (þessor þæn, þessor orð); it seems to be a Norse form: [A.S. þes, pl. þás; Engl. this, these; Hel. þese; O.H.G. deser; Germ. dieser; Dan.-Swed. denne is formed from the old acc. þenna; pl. disse.]

B. THE SENSE.—This, pl. these. For the usages see the writers passim; it suffices to observe, that þessi is used both as adjective and as substantive; as adjective it may be placed before or after its noun (þessi kona or kona þessi); ellipt. usages are, i þessu, in this moment, Fms. ii. 60; i þessi (viz. hrið), in this nick of time, x. 415. For its usage with the article inn, see hinn, p. 263, col. 1 (II. 1); þessi inn skakk-borni, sveinn, Al. 29; þenna inn unga dreng, 656 C. 32, and passim.

2. valuables, jewels (esp. of a married lady), the law often speaks of the 'þing' and the 'heimanfylgja'; ef maðr fær konu at lands-lögum réttum . . . þá skulu lúkask henni þing sín ok heimanfylgja, Gpl. 231; hann hafði ör undir-heimum þau þing at eigi munu slík í Noregi, Fms. iii. 178; síðan tók hön þing sín, 195; eftir samkvámu (marriage) þeirra þá veitti Sveinn konungr áhald þingum þeim er jót vóru ok skilat með systur hans, x. 394; maðr skal skilja þing með frændkonu sinni ok svá heiman-fylgiu, N. B. As a law phrase [see þingvöllr]: I. an assembly, meeting, a general term for any public meeting, esp. for purposes of legislation, a parliament, including courts of law; in this sense þing is a standard word throughout all Scandinavian countries (cp. the Tyn-wald, or meeting-place of the Manx parliament): technical phrases, blása til þings, kveðja þings, stefna þing, setja þing, kenna þing (N. G. L. i. 63); helga þing, heyja þing, eiga þing; slíta þingi, segja þing laust, to dissolve a meeting, see the verbs: so also a þing 'er fast' when sitting, 'er laust' when dissolved (fastr l. 7, lauss II. 7); Dróttins-dag hinn fyrri í þingi, ríða af þingi, ríða á þing, til þings, vera um nótt af þingi, öndvert þing, ofanvert þing, Grág. i. 24, 25; nú eru þar þing (parliaments) tvau á einum þingvelli, ok skulu þeir þá fara um þau þing bæði (in local sense), 127; um varit tóku bændr af þingit ok vildu eigi hafa, Vápn. 22; hann hafði tekit af Vöðla-þing, skyldi þar eigi sóknar-þing heita, Sturl. i. 141: in countless instances in the Sagas and the Grág., esp. the Nj. passim, Íb. ch. 7, Gisl. 54-57, Glúm. ch. 24, 27, Eb. ch. 9, 10, 56, Lv. ch. 4, 15-17: other kinds of assemblies in Icel. were Leidar-þing, also called Þriðja-þing, Grág. i. 148; or Leid, q. v.; hreppstjórnar-þing (see p. 284); manntals-þing; in Norway, bygða-þing, D. N. ii. 330; hús-þing, vápnar-þing, refsí-þing, v. sub vocc.:—eccl. a council, H. E. i. 457, Ann. 1274; þing í Nicea, 415. 14.

2. a parish (opp. to a benefice); in Iceland this word is still used of those parishes whose priest does not reside by the church, no manse being appointed as his fixed residence; such a parish is called þing or þinga-braud (and he is called þinga-prestr, q. v.), as opp. to a 'beneficium', Grág. i. 471, K. þ. K. 30, 70, K. Á. passim; bóndi er skyldr at ala presti hest til allra nauðsynja í þingum, Vm. 73; tíundir af hverjum bónda í þingunum, 96, Bs. i. 330, H. E. ii. 48, 85, 128.

3. an interview, of lovers, H. E. i. 244; þat var talat at þorbjörn væri í þingum við Þórdís, Gisl. 5; nær þú á þingi mant nenna Njarðar syni, Skm. 38; man-þing, laun-þing.

II. loc. a district, county, shire, a þing-community, like lög (see p. 369, col. 2, B. II.); a 'þing' was the political division of a country; hence the law phrase, vera í þingi með goða, to be in the district of such and such a goði, to be his liegeman, cp. þingfesti; or, segjask ok þingi, see the Grág., Nj., and Sagas, passim; full goðorð ok forn þing, Grág. i. 15; í því þingi eðr um þau þing, 85. In later times Icel. was politically divided into twelve or thirteen counties. In old days every community or 'law' had its own assembly or parliament, whence the double sense of 'lög' as well as of 'þing'.

C. HISTORICAL REMARKS.—In Norway the later political division and constitution of the country dates from king Hacon the Good and his counsellors Thorleif the Wise and earl Sigurd. As king Harold Fair-hair was the conqueror of Norway, so was his son Hacon her legislator as also the founder of her constitution, and of her political division into 'þings'; for this is the true meaning of the classical passage,—hann (king Hacon) lagði mikinn hug á laga-setning í Noregi, hann setti Gulþings-lög ok Frostþings-lög, ok Heiðsævis-lög fyrst at uppha en áðr höfðu sér hverir fylkis-menn lög, Ó. H. 9; in Hkr. l.c. the passage runs thus—hann setti Gulþings-lög með ráði Þorleifs spak ok hann setti Frostþings-lög með ráði Sigurðar jarls ok annara þranna þeirra er vitrastir vóru, en Heiðsævis-lög hafði sett Hálfdan svarti, se fyrr er ritað, Hkr. 349 new Ed.; the account in Eg. ch. 57, therefore although no doubt true in substance, is, as is so often the case in the Sagas, an anachronism; for in the reign of Eric 'Bloodaxe,' there were only isolated fylkis-þing, and no Gula-þing. In later times St. Olaf added a fourth þing, Borgar-þing, to the three old ones of king Hacon (those of Gula, Frosta, and Heiðsævi); and as he became a saint, he got the name of legislator in the popular tradition, the credit of it was taken from Hacon, the right man; yet Sighvat the poet speaks, in h Bersöglis-vísur, of the laws of king Hacon the foster-son of Athelstan. Distinction is therefore to be made between the ancient 'county' þing and the later 'united' þing, called lög-þing (Maurer's 'ding-bund'); al-almennilegt þing or almannar-þing, D. N. ii. 265, iii. 277; fjórðunga þing ii. 282; alþingi, alls-herjar-þing. The former in Norway was called fylkis-þing, or county þing, in Icel. vár-þing, héraðs-þing, fjórðunga-þing (cp. A. S. scírgemot, a shiremote). Many of the old pre-Haconian fylki þing or shiremotes seem to have continued long afterwards, at least i name, although their importance was much reduced; such we believe were the Hauga-þing (the old fylkis-þing of the county Westfold), Fm viii. 245, Fb. ii. 446, iii. 24; as also Þróndarness-þing, Arnarheims-þing, Kefleyjar-þing, Mork. 179.

II. In Iceland the united þing or parliament was called Al-þingi; for its connection with the legislation of king Hacon, see Íb. ch. 2-5 (the chronology seems to be confused); again the earlier Icel. spring þings (vár-þing), also called héraðs-þing (count þing) or fjórðunga-þing (quarter þing), answer to the Norse fylkis-þing such were the Þórness-þing, Eb., Landn., Gisl., Sturl.; Kjalarness-þing Landn. (App.); Þverár-þing, Íb.; also called þingness-þing, Sturl. i. 94; Húnavatns-þing, Vd.; Vöðla-þing, Lv., Band.; Skaptafells-þing, Nj. Arness-þing, Flóam. S.; þingskála-þing, Nj.; Hegraness-þing, Glúm Lv., Grett.; Múla-þing (two of that name), Jb. (begin.), cp. Grág. i. 127 Þorskafljarðar-þing, Gisl., Landn.; þingeyjar-þing, Jb.; further, Krak-lækjar-þing, Dropl. (vellum, see Ný Fél. xxi. 125); Sunnudals-þing, Vápn. þing við Vallna-laug, Lv.; þing í Straumfirði, Eb.; Hvalseyar-þing, Gisl. or þing í Dýrafirði, Sturl.; Fjósatungu-þing, Lv.

III. In Swede the chief þings named were Uppsala-þing, Ó. H.; and Mora-þing (wrongly called Múla-þing, Ó. H. l.c., in all the numerous vellum MSS. of this Saga the Icelandic chronicler or the transcriber probably had in mind the Icel. þing of that name).

IV. In Denmark, Vebjarga-þing, Knyt. S.; Íseyrar-þing, Jömsv. S.

V. in the Faeroe Islands, the þing in Þórshöfn, Fær.: in Greenland, the þing in Garðar, Fbr.

(of the priest), Grág. (Kb.) i. 3, 43, 132, Nj. 87; því einu er rétt at hafa þingfesti í öðrum fjórðungi heldr enn er maðr býr, ef eða er þat lofat þeim at lögbergi at taka þriðjungs-mann útan-fjórðungs, Grág. i. 165, which last passage is evidently a 'novella.'

B. There was also a different use of 'þinn' in the vocat., viz. in addressing a person generally in connexion with some word of abuse; þinn heljar-karl, thou bell-carle! Fb. i. 212; þitt íllmenni! Fs. 36; þinn skelmir! 166; also placed after the noun, even with the suffixed article, hefir þú svíkit mík, hundrinn þinn! C. In Norway, even in a sense of compassion, nú frýs du í hel, ditt vesle ting! gakk heim-atter, din krok = thou, poor fellow! but more freq. as abuse, dú saggla! ditt naut! ditt stygge fæ! or it is even there extended to the first person, eg, min arming, I, poor thing! me, vaare stakarar = we, poor fellows! eg vliste inkje bettra, min daare! Ivar Aasen's Norse Gram. p. 332. 2. in cases other than the vocative, but much more rarely; viltu nú þigga gríð? þá svarar jarl, eigi af hundinum þínum, not from thee, thou dog! Fms. vi. 323; af fretkarli þínum, Fs. 160: acc.; er ek sé þik, frænda skömm þína ..., er ek ói þinn úvita, Krók. 7 new Ed.; skulu vér færa þinn úvin til heljar, Fms. vi. 212. 3. in old writers even in plur., but very rarely; hvi róa djöflar yðrir (ye devils!), fyrir oss í alla nótt, Fms. ix. 50.—We believe this 'þinn,' as a vocative, to be not the possess. pron. but a compounded form of the pers. pron. 'þú' and the article 'inn,' þinn being qs. þ'inn, literally thou the ...! A strong, and almost conclusive, proof of this is that the uncontracted form actually occurs and is used in exactly the same sense as the contracted 'þinn'; þú í vándi slangi, thou the wicked scamp! Skíða R.; þú inn armi, thou wretch! Ld. 326; þú inn mikli maðr, thou the great man! Eg. 488; þú hinn góði þjón og trúlyndi, Matth. xxv. 21: the full phrase was accordingly altered in one of two ways; either the article was dropped, góði og t. þjón, 20, or pronoun and particle were both contracted in one word, as above. The phrase, we may presume, at first could only have been used in the vocative (þinn!), but the origin being soon in sight of, it was gradually extended to other cases (hundinum þínum and even, esp. in mod. usage, to the other possessive pronouns (djölf yðrir). Bearing this in mind, it is easy to understand why this usage peculiar to the Scandinavian tongue, for although the possessive pronoun 'þinn,' thine, etc., is common to all Teutonic languages, the article 'in' is peculiar to the northern languages, and therefore a word compound with it would be so also. Analogous are the phrases, sá inn, þat it, þú inn, þann inn ..., see p. 263, col. 1 (A. II). For another view, see Grim Kleine Schr. iii. 256, and 271 sqq.

G. and Germ. dorf; Lat. turba is taken to be the same word: this word, we think, was originally applied to the cottages of the poorer peasantry crowded together in a hamlet, instead of each house standing in its own enclosure, like the 'tún' or 'bær' or 'garðr' of the 'búandi', hence þorpari = a churl (see below); the etymological sense being a crowd, throng, as seen in þyrpast, þyrping (qq. v.), as also in Lat. turba:] 1. a hamlet, village, rarely of an isolated farm; fóru þau um kveldit í annat þorp skamt þaðan, . . . þorsteinn hét þar bóndi, Hkr. i. 189 (in East-Norway), Fms. x. 219; margir vóru búendur þar í þorpinu, Ó. H. 151; til Niðaróss, þar var þorp nokkurt sett ok kaupstaðr, Fms. x. 294; um þorp ok um bæi (Scotland), Orkn. 78; in Edda 108, þorp ef þeir eru, . . . 2. when used of foreign countries it means a thorp or village; borgir, kastalar, þorp, Fms. vii. 94; þorp ok tún, Sks. 631; Írar hlaupa saman í eitt þorp, Ld. 78; borg eða þorp, Stj. 96, 183; þar (in Frisland) varð brátt fyrir þeim þorp eitt ok hygðu þar margir bændr, Eg. 528; Lat. villa is rendered 'þorp', Róm. 132, Hom. (St.), (= Matt. xxii. 5); þorpin stóðu á bryggjunum ok mikitt fjölmenni í þeim þorpum (of London), O. H. L. ch. 10: metaph., þrætu-þorp, the abode of quarrel, i. e. the mouth, Fms. vi. (in a verse).

3. the word occurs twice in poets in the same sense as in the Goth., a land; hrágrnar þöll sú er stendr þorpi á, hlýrat henni bórkr né barr, Hm. 49 (here 'þorp' seems to mean a field, fenced place, or garden, as opp. to the 'wood'); þjárr þjóðar falla þorp yfir meyjia Mögþrasi, three great rivers fall over the field of the Nörns, Vpm. 49. II. very freq. as the second compd of Dan. local names, as -trup, or -rup dropping the t, Hos-trup, Krá-trup, Kolde-rup, Vins-trup, Sverdrup; but in early Dan. -torp or -thorp, thus Bukke-thorp, Thume-thorp, Ny-thorp = mod. Dan. Nyrup, and in many names of places, see Dipl. Thorkel. passim; so also Engl. -thorp and Germ. -dorf: in Norway such local names are rare, in Iceland still more so, yet a Þorpar, f. pl., occurs in western Iceland, in Stranda-sýsla, called together 'í þorpum'. The reason is that in flat countries cottages lie closer together than in a mountainous country.

ÞÓRR, m., gen. Þórs, dat. and acc. Þór, but Þóri dat., Bragi; in unic inscriptions spelt þur; [A. S. þunor; Engl. thunder; North. E. runner; Dutch donder; O. H. G. donar; Germ. donner; Hel. thunar; an. Tor, in tor-den; cp. Lat. tono and tonitrus; the word Þór-r is therefore formed by absorption of the middle n, and contraction of an older syllabic þonor into one syllable, and is a purely Scandinavian form; hence in A. S. charters or diplomas it is a sure sign of forgery when times compd with þur- appear in deeds pretending to be of a time earlier than the Danish invasion in the 9th century; although in later times they abound; the Engl. Thurs-day is a later form, in which the phonetic rule of the Scand. tongue has been followed; perh. it is a North. E. form. here is a short essay by Jacob Grimm on the etymology of this word.]

A. The god Thor, the god of thunder, keeper of the hammer, the ever-fighting slayer of trolls and destroyer of evil spirits, the friend of mankind, the defender of the earth, the heavens, and the gods, for without Thor and his hammer the earth would become the helpless prey of the giants. He was the consecrator, the hammer being the cross or holy sign of the ancient heathen, hence the expressive phrase of a heathen Danish Runic stone, þurr vigi þessi runar, 'Thor, consecrate these Runes!' Rafn 193. Thor was the son of mother Earth; lust, hot-tempered, without fraud or guile, of few words and ready roke,—such was Thor, the favourite deity of the ancients. The finest legends of the Edda, and the best lays (the lays of Hymir, Thrym, and Vafþrúdnir) refer to Thor, see the Edda passim, Eb. the first chapters—hann varðveitti þar í eyinni Þórs-hof, ok var mikill vin Þórs, ... hann lékk til fréttar við Þór ástvin sinn ..., Eb.; Helgi var bláinn í trú, hann trúði á Krist, en hét á Þór til sjófara ok harðræða, Landn. 206. or a head of Thor carved on the high-seat pillars, see Eb., Fbr.: or on talisman, Fs. 97.

B. COMPS OF PROPER NAMES.—The name of Thor has always been thought to sound well, and is much used in pr. names; (hann átti) on er Steinn hét, þann svein gaf Þórólfr Þór vin sínun ok kallaði Þór-ein, Eb.; uncompd only in the form Þórir of a man, Þóra of a woman, at common in compds, where in mod. usage the vowel is sounded long before a vowel, and before b and d, elsewhere short, but in old times it has no doubt ó throughout;—thus, as a prefix, Þór-álfr, Þórólfr, Þórrarr, Þór-ariann, Þór-oddr, Þór-haddr, Þór-halli, Þór-allr; but Þór-bergr, Þór-björn, Þór-brandr, Þór-annr, Þór-auntr, Þór-geirr, Þór-gestr (Þórgeistingar, the family of Th., b.), Þór-grinnr, Þór-gils, Þór-gnfr, Þór-kell (qs. Þorketill), Þór-lákr (sounded Þollákr, Bs. i. 356, l. 18, and so in mod. usage), Þór-leifr, Þór-leikr, Þór-ljótr, Þór-móðr, Þór-mundr (Dan. unic stone), Þór-steinn (sounded Þosteinn, and often spelt so in ter vellums), Þór-valdr, Þór-varðr, Þór-víðr; of women, Þór-v, Þór-arna, Þór-anna, Þór-gríma, Þór-gunna, Þór-halla, Þór-hildir, Þór-unn, Þór-dís, Þór-gerðr, Þór-björg, Þór-katla, Þór-ný, Þór-veig, Þór-vör.

2. as a suffix, -þórr, -þóra, -þórr, -þóra, -Þór-órr, qs. Arn-þórr and Arn-óra, Stein-ðórr, Hall-ðórr and Hall-dóra, Berg-þórr and Berg-þóra, Ey-þórr and Ey-þóra, Haf-þórr. Of all these names, three demand special mention, viz. Þórðr, being a contr. qs. Þór-róðr (as Bárðr = Bár-róðr), the old uncontr. form occurs in poems of the 10th century, e.g. Þórðr vinon óra, Korm. 132; so ghvat calls his own father Þórðr (dissyll.), yet he makes it rhyme as if contracted (Þórðr er var forðum), so Þórðr skorðu, Bjarn. (in a verse): the other name is Þórríðr, a fem. name, a weakened form for Þóríðr, Íb. 363 (qs. Þór-ríðr, like Sig-ríðr); thirdly, Þýrrí, a fem. name, weakened from Þór-vé, or still older Þór-veig, mod. Dan. Thyra,

preskjöldr, m. [this word is derived from preskja and völlr, and prop. means a threshing-floor, because in ancient times the floor at the entrance was used for threshing, but it then came to mean the block of wood or stone beneath the door, doorsill or thresbold; and that in ancient times it was so, is borne out by phrases as, Grima sat á preskeldi, Fbr.;

or, stíga yfir preskeldinn, Eb. l. c.; or, preskeldrinn var hár fyrir durun-um, O.H.L. 85; see the references. The latter part of the compd, into ll. The word is declined like völlr; nom. preskjöldr, or, dropping the

gen. sing. and plur. 2. but as the etymology was forgotten, the ii. l. c. The form preskjöldr, found in mod. Icel. books, is a bad attempt at an etymology, as if it were derived from prep and skjöldr. The form

ÞÚSUND, f.; sérhverja þúsund, Stj. 298; á þúsund (dat.), Sks. 705; tveir, þrjár ... þúsundir, 623. 53: in mod. usage it is mostly neut. (influenced by Latin?), but also fem. It is spelt þús-hund, Barl. 53; þús-hundum, Fms. vi. 409 (v.l.), Geisli 49; another form þús-hund-rað (q.v.) is freq., esp. in Stj., Barl.; this double form -hund and -hundrað answers to the equally double form of 'hundred,' see p. 292, and is a proof that þúsund is a compound word, the latter part of which is 'hund' or 'hundred'; the etymology of the former part 'þús' is less certain; it is, we believe, akin to þysja, þyss, þaus-nir (a lost strong verb þúsa, þaus, þusu); þúsund would thus literally mean a swarm of hundreds: [in Goth. the gender varies, þúsundi, pl. þúsundjos=χιλιοι, or þusundja, neut.; A.S. þúsund; Engl. thousand; O.H.G. dusunta; Germ. tausend, qs. dausend; Swed. tusende and tusen; Dan. tusinde; Dutch tuyzend: this word is also common to the Slavonic languages; again, the Lapp. dubat and Finn. tubat are no doubt borrowed from the Slavonic, or Scandinavian; the Gr., Lat., and Sansk. use other words]:—a thousand.

B. There is little doubt that with the ancient heathen Scandinavians (and perhaps all Teutons), before their contact with the civilised southern people, the notion of numbers was limited, and that their thousand was not a definite number, but a vague term, denoting a swarm, crowd, host (cp. the Gr. ποῖοι): in ancient lays it occurs thrice (Hkv., Em., Fas. i. 502), but indefinitely; hvat þrym er þar sem þúsund bífisk eðr mengi til mikit, what a din is there as if a thousand were shaking, or an over-mickle multitude, Em. 2; sjau þúsundir, Hkv. i. 49, literally=seven thousands, but in fact meaning seven hosts of men.

2. the dat. pl. þúsundum is, like hundrúðum, used adverbially=by thousands, in countless numbers, Fms. vi. 409 (in a verse), Geisli 49. 3. in the ancient popular literature, uninfluenced by southern writers, 'þúsund,' as a definite number, occurs, we think, not half-a-dozen times. As the multiple of ten duodecimal hundreds, ere the decimal hundred was adopted, 'þúsund' would mean twelve decimal hundreds; and such is its use in the Sverris Saga, Fms. viii. 40, where one vellum says 'tvar þúsundir,' whilst the others, by a more idiomatic phrase, call it 'twenty hundreds.'

II. in ecclesiastical writers, and in annals influenced by the Latin and the like, it is frequent enough; tíu þúsundir, fjórtán þúsundir, Fms. i. 107, 108 (annalistic records); fimn þúsundir, xi. 386, Al. 117; tíu þúsundum, Sks. 705; tíu þúsundum sinna hundrað þúsunda, Hom.; þúsund þúsunda a thousand of thousands, i.e. a million, (mod.); hundrað þúsundir rasta ok átta tígir þúsunda, ... hundrað þúsund mílna, Fb. i. 31 (in the legend of Eric the Far-traveller and Paradise, taken from some church-legend); fjórar þúsundir, Þiðr. 234: or of the years of the world, sex þúsundir vetra, Fs. 197; sjau þúsundir vetra, Landn. 34.

C. REMARKS.—The popular way of counting high numbers was not by thousands, but by tens (decades) and duodecimal hundreds as factors; thus ten ... twenty hundreds, and then going on three, four, five, six ... tens of hundreds (a 'ten of hundreds' being=1200). The following references may illustrate this—tíu hundruð, ellefu hundruð, tólf hundruð, þrettán hundruð, fimntán hundruð ... Íb. 17, Ó.H. 119, 201, Fms. vii. 295, xi. 383, 385. From twenty and upwards—tuttugu hundrað manna, twenty hundreds of men, Fms. vii. 324, viii. 40; hálfir þrjú hundraða skipa, two tens and a half hundreds of ships, i.e. twenty-five hundreds, Fas. i. 378; þrjár tígir hundraða manna, three tens of hundreds of men, Fms. viii. 311; var skorat manntal, háðfi hann meirr enn þrjár tígir hundraða manna, vii. 204; þrír tígir hundraða, D.N. v. 18; nær fjórir tígir hundraða manna, nearly four tens of hundreds of men, Fms. vii. 275; á fimta tígir hundraða, on the fifth ten of hundreds, i.e. from four to five tens of hundreds, viii. 321; sex tígir hundraða, six tens of hundreds, 311, xi. 390; sex tígir hundraða manna, Fb. ii. 518, D.I. i. 350,—all odd amounts being neglected. The highest number recorded as actually reckoned in this way is 'six tens of hundreds' (fimtán tígir hundraða, fifteen tens of hundreds, Fms. viii. 321, v.l., is a scribe's error): it is probable that no reckoning exceeded twelve tens of hundreds. All high multiples were unintelligible to the ancients; the number of the Einherjar in Walhalla is in the old lay Gm. thus expressed,—there are 'five hundred doors in Walhalla, and five tens beside (the 'five tens' are, by the way, merely added for alliteration's sake), and eight hundred Einherjar will walk out of each door when they go out to fight the Wolf' (on the Day of final Doom). There seems to have been some dim exaggerated notion of a definite thousand in an ancient lay, only preserved in a half alliterative prose paraphrase, Fas. i. 502, where a mythical host is given thus,—there were thirty-three phalanxes, each of five 'thousand,' each thousand of thirteen hundreds, each hundred four times the counted. The armies in the battle of Brawalla, the greatest of the mythical age, are given, not in numbers, but by the space the ranks occupied, Skjöld. S. ch. 8. This resembles the story in Ó.H. ch. 59, of the two young brothers, king's sons: when asked what they would like to have most of, the one said 'Cows.' 'And how many?' 'As many,' said he, 'as could stand packed in a row round the lake (Mjösen in Norway) and drink.' 'But you?' they asked the other boy: 'House-carles' (soldiers), said he. 'And how many?' 'As many,' said he, 'as would in one meal eat up all my brother's cows.' Add also the tale of the King and the Giant, and the number of the giant's house carles, Maurer's Volksagen 306. No less elementary was the rule for division and fractions, of which a remarkable instance is preserved in an ancient Icelandic deed, called Spákomu-ætti, published in D.L. i. 305. See also the words tigr, hundrað, skot, skota, and the remarks in Gramm. p. 502. The Homeric numeration, as set forth in Mr. Gladstone's Homeric Studies, vol. iii, p. 425 sqq., is highly interesting, and bears a striking resemblance to that of the ancient Scandinavians. We may notice that in Iceland land and property are still divided into hundreds (hundreds of cells=120), see hundrað B; in this case a thousand is never used, but units and hundreds of hundreds as factors, thus, sex tóga hundraða, in Reykh. Múld. (a deed of the 12th century), and so still in mod. usage; a wealthy man of the 15th century is said to have bequeathed to his daughters in land, 'tölf hundruð hundraða ok elleftu-tíu og tveim hundruð betr, en í lausafé fimn hundruð hundraða,' i.e. twelve hundreds of hundreds and 'eleven' and two hundreds, and in movable five hundreds of hundreds, Fæga-æti 16 (by the learned Bogi Benediktsson of Stads-fell in Iceland, A.D. 1771–1849); sjau hundruð hundraða og þrjátíu hundruð betr, 21; hann optir-lét börnum sínum þjannum upp á nju hundruð hundraða, 22,—a proof that in very remote times, when this valuation of land first took place, 'thousand' was still unknown as a definite number.

pýðverskr, adj., but better pýðerskr, often spelt pýverskr; the v and r are due to a wrong notion as to its origin, as if it came from -verjar (= men), instead of the inflex. iskr, as is seen from the German form; [O. H. G. Diutisc; mid. H. G. Diutisch, Tiusch; low Lat. Theotiscus; Hel. Thiudisk; mod. Germ. Deutsch, Deutsch; Engl. Dutch; these forms shew that v and r are in the Norse wrongly inserted; the old Icel. word was evidently borrowed from the Germ. through the trading people, perhaps in the 11th or 12th century; it does not therefore appear in a genuine Norse form, for then the inflexive iskr should have been assimilated to the preceding root word, so forming a monosyllable; the mod. form pýðr is in this respect correct; the root word is Goth. þiuda = þjóð, see Grimm's Dict. s. v. ii. 1043; in Ulf. þiupisko = ἐθνικός]; — German; pýðerskir menn (pýðerskir, pýverskir, pýðskir, v. l.), Fms. vii. 248; Vindum ok pýðerskum mönnum, x. 45, v. l.; pýðerska menn, 47; en pýðerskir menn segja, Fas. i. 332; pýverskir, Fb. i. 355, l. c.; pýverskr, Ann. 1342 C; svá segir í kvæðum pýðerskum, þjóðr. 304; frá sögn pýðerskra manna, 334; pýðerskum kvæðum, 231, 330, 352; pýðerskra manna sögur, 180; í pýðersku tunga, i. 302, 304.

Æ (Œ)

This is a double letter—æ, compounded of a and e (a + e), being a kind of appendage to a, and æ, compounded of o and e (o + e), being an appendage to o. In the alphabet of Thorodd the former was marked f, the latter ð, as in vén, fôtr; later, the accent was dropped. The ð is also written o, o, æ, or even o or eo, thus fôti, fœti, or corri=œrri, whence in modern print æ: most vellums write æ (a + e) and œ (o + e) respectively, which characters have been adopted in modern print. In Icel. the æ-sound was soon lost; only the earliest vellums distinguish the two sounds; then in later vellums æ, œ are used indiscriminately, the difference in sound being lost, the characters remaining, till at last the useless sign disappeared. Almost all the Icel. Sagas are preserved in vellums later than the time when the sounds had become confounded; the Cod. Reg. of the Grág. still keeps the distinction, owing probably to its excellent old originals; the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm. Edda uses both signs, but misplaces them, thus, Hm. 92 mæla, but fœr (pres. from fá), in the same verse. The confusion between æ and œ is purely Icelandic, for in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden the distinction has been preserved up to the present day, thus, Dan. brødre, Swed. bröder, döttr, födder, böne, but sæde, nætter, læge, etc., Icel. bræðr, dætr, fætr, hæna, sæti, nætr, læknir, etc. The æ was sounded ē (as Germ. ā, in nābe, or a lengthened Engl. a, perhaps more protracted), this sound was still heard down to the time of Árni Magnússon (end of the 17th century), see Gramm. p. xxxv, col. 2; it is now sounded like Engl. long i (time), but this sound was unknown to the ancients, except in the interjection ai (= æ, see below):—we can only guess at the sound of æ; judging from the analogy of æ, it may have been like Germ. böbe, Fr. feu, only more protracted; in a diphthongal form (like æ into ai) it would be oi, and indeed the word ei in its modern form au (i.e. oi) may be a relic of this. 2. v cannot be sounded before æ, being an u-sound; thus we have æðr, æða, from vaða, óðr; but before æ, being an a-sound, it is both sounded and written. For the umlaut see Gramm. p. xxix.

Æ, adv., in vellums also spelt o, i.e. = o; e hvert, Blanda; þess Guðs er lífr ok e man lífa, Blanda: ea, ea standa mér augu of eld til Gunnildar, Ágrip (in a verse); freq. ey and ei, see ei, p. 117: [Goth. aiw in ni-aiw = never; A. 6. 'airt', 'regio caeli' the etymology of átt from átta (eight), suggested at p. 47, col. I, is too fanciful.]

Genealogies (ættir, ættar-tölur, ætt-vísi) form the ground-work of the old Icel. historiography; the ancient Saga-men delighted in them, and had a marvellous memory for lineages; in the Sagas the pedigrees give the clue by which to trace the succession of events, and supply the want of chronology. Whole chapters in the best Sagas, esp. at the beginning of a work, are set apart for genealogies, thus, Nj. ch. i. 19, 20, 25, 26, 46, 57, 96, 97, 114, 115, 155, as also 47, 57, 58, 106 (begin.), Eb. ch. i. 7, 8, 12, 65, Ld. ch. i. 31, 32, Eg. ch. 23, Gullþ. ch. i, Dropl. In the Sturlunga S. the initial chapters (Sturl. i. 44-55, with which the work of Sturla begins) are devoted to the tracing the families of that time; so also Sturl. i. 202-206, iii. 96, 97. Ö (Ø)

This letter properly consists of two vowels, different in sound and in origin; an a-vowel, an 'umlaut' of a, and nearly related to it, and a u-vowel, nearly related to the letters o, u, and y in modern Danish these two ö-sounds are still distinguished in pronunciation, the one being open almost like Engl. i before r, as in fir, the other closed like eo in French feu: Rask and Petersen, the founders of the phonology of the Danish tongue, were the first to give separate symbols for these two sounds; the first they marked ö, the second ø (horn, here). The modern Icel. knows only one sound, answering to the Danish ø, but that it was not so in old days may be proved from the vellums and from the grammarians. Thorodd marks the two sounds respectively by ö and ø. Most of the vellums are very loose in their spelling, marking at random ö, ø, au, u, ö (oll, öll, aull, æll): phonetically ö stands exactly in the same relation to æ, the umlaut of ä, as ö to ä, the umlaut of ä, so that ö and ø are the short, æ and ä respectively the corresponding long vowels; ö and ø, ä and ä being two pairs of sounds, just as are ö and ø, ä and ä. 'Goðröði' and 'göd ræði', Skálda, Thorodd: in very old vellums, e. g. the Rb. Cod. 1812, the ö is often marked ø, thus keomr = kømr, conu = ønu = ynn, geora = gjora or gora: in Norse vellums ö is often written æ, e. g. smær = smjör, confounding the two sounds, ö and æ. A few good vellums keep the distinction in the main, not as Thorodd's alphabet does, but generally by writing ey for ø (this must not be confounded with the diphthong ey); among those vellums are the Cod. Reg. of Sam. Edda, the Cod. Acad. of the Hkr. (now lost), the Cod. Fris., the (lost) vellum of Rafn S. (see Bs. i. pref. lix), although none of them strictly follows the rule; only a few Editions (e. g. Prof. Unger's Edit. of the Hkr.) have tried to observe the distinction; most Editions print ö throughout. We shall now try to give a list of the chief words and forms which have the ö. The chief guide in doing this is twofold, the ey of the vellums and the change of ö into e or é, by which a triple form arises, ö, ey, and e, of which ö and ey, no doubt, are mere variations.

1. the ö is either, 1. the umlaut of o; in the plurals, sönir seynir senir, hnötr hneit, stöðr stöð (sonr, hnöt, stöð): in the compar. and superl., neðri neyrðri nerðri, næztr neyztr nerztr, þfiri efri, öfstr efstr (from norðr, of): in the subj., þörði þerði, þöðði þeyðði (Fms. viii. 380), möndi (from þora, pola, monu or munn), bjöggi beyggi, hjöggi heyggi (from búa, bjögga, höggva, hjöggva): the presents, kømr, tröðr treðr, þftr sefr (from koma, troða, sofa): the prets., fiðri freyri feri, gnøri gneyri gneri, sþri seri, sløri sleri, røri reyri teri, kþøri keyri keri, snøri sneyri sneri, grøri greyri greri (see Gramm. p. xxlii): the words öðli eyðli öðli, öðla (a lizard) eyðla öðla, höðli heyli höðli: in -þöðr (Goðröðr, see Thorodd), -fiðr freyðr -fæðr (Hallfrøðr Hallfrøðr Hallfrøðr), hnøri hneyri hneri, öxn eyxn exn, kþøri keri (a probe), kþøri (a choice) keyr ker, kþøtr keyptr keptr kþætr: þrøndi eyrøndi erendi: the prefix particle, ör-eyr-er:- the words kþøt ket, smjör smær, mjöð mél (prop. køt, smøt, møt), gørsemar gersemar, örr and eyrr, a scar, Fms. viii. 275, v. l.; hrør and hreyr, heyrum and hørum (p. 261, col. 2).

2. in the case of roots in -vi or -øy, where both ö and y struggle for the umlaut, the result is an ö; in this case even a radical a changes into ö (this was for the first time observed by the late Danish scholar Lyngbye), thus, gøfva geyfra gera (from garvian), gørr geyrr geri (= ready), gørv gervi, gørsemi gersemi, öx eyx ex (Goth. aguis), sørv seyrv. This is esp. freq. in those roots which have g or k for the middle consonant, in which cases the root vowel, either a or i, changes into ö; as in the verbs sløkva, sökkva, stökkva, hrökkva, klökkva, slöngva, höggva, hnöggva, þröngva; in the adjectives, dökk, nökkvið, glögg, hnögg, snögg; similarly with the orthography ey for ö, — heygg (caedo). Am. 39; deygva hramms, Skv. 2. 20; at kleycqvi Göðrun, Am. 58; kleccva, Akv. 24; hvi er þér steyct ör landi, Hkv. Hjörv. 31; nú mun hön seyyvaz, Vsp. 62; seycstu nú gygr (sink thou now), Heir. 14; sleynðgi svá silfri, Am. 46; steycr lüðr fyrir, Hkv. 2. 2; sýtr æ gleyggv við gjöfum, Hm. 48; gleyggv, Skv. 1. 7; gleyggv, 291; neykvan (quidam), Am. 49; neyccviðr, Hm. 49; Beyggv við büggv, Ls. 45; rökvið and rekvið, Hkv. Hjörv. 35, Bugge (pref. ix); reykr = rökr, Fms. iv. 70: the word rekkja (a bed) is also spelt reykkja, and even rjukja, Art. (Ed. Kölbinding) 64; vekka and vökvi. Phonetically connected with this change, but in a reverse order, is the change in the words nekkverr nökkurr nokkurr and engi öngv öngvan, etc. In all the above instances the ey means ö, and is merely substituted for that sound, and is accordingly altogether different from the diphthong ey, see p. 114, col. 2, l. 15 sqq.

3. one may also assume an ö in the few instances where jö and jo, and jo and y interchange; in mjölk and mjolk (milk), misk or myrk and mykill, þjökk and þykk, mjörkvi and myrkvi. This ö of the ancient tongue is the parent of the e in several modern words and forms, e. g. in the presents, sefr, kømr, tröðr, beggr, sekk, stekkr, hrekkr; in the preterites, greri, sneri, feri; the compar., efri, efstr, helztr; in gera, erindi, frerar, and freðinn: so also in the words két, mél, smær; and in inverse order, in nökkurr, in öngv, öngvan, öngum, from eingun; cp. Dan. sen for sön. The close phonetic relation between ö and y is shown by the fact that g or k before an ö was sounded as an aspirate, thus, göra, köt, kjöri, sounded gjöra, kjöt, kjöri, and more lately spelt with a j, analogous to gjæta, kjær, = gæta, kær, for the j in these words is not radical.

II. for the ö see Gramm. p. xxix, col. 2, and the introduction to letter A, p. 1. Runolf, in his Gramm. Island. of A.D. 1650, distinguishes between o longum (ö), o breve (o), and o brevissimum (ö).

önd-vegi and önd-ugi, n. [from and- (opposite) and vegr]:—an opposite-seat, high-seat, so called because two seats are placed opposite to one another; in ancient timbered halls the benches were placed longways, running along the walls of the halls (see bekkr), with the two seats of honour in the middle facing one another; the northern bench facing the sun, was called öndvegi it æðra, the higher or first high-seat, the opposite or southern bench being it úæðra, the lower or second high-seat; the two high-seats were the most honoured places in the hall, and a chief guest used to be placed in the southern high-seat. In England the master and mistress sitting opposite one another at each end of the table may be a remnant of this old Scandinavian custom. The sides of the high-seat were ornamented with uprights (öndugis-súlur) carved with figures, such as a head of Thor or the like; these posts were regarded with religious reverence; many of the settlers of Iceland are said to have taken the high-seat posts with them, and when near Iceland to have thrown them overboard to drift ashore, and where they found them, there they took up their abode. When a man of rank died, the son, after all rites performed, solemnly seated himself in his father's seat, as a token of succession: in Vd. ch. 23, the sons sat not in the father's seat before they had avenged his death.

ÖR- (i. e. ör-), a prefixed particle, altered from us-; the s remains in usall = vesall, see p. 699, col. 2; also spelt er-, er-vita, Hkv.; or eyr-, eyr-grynni, Ó. H. 106; eyr-lygi, Eg. (in a verse): [Ulf. us-; O. H. G. ur-; when uncompounded, see ör, mod. úr, p. 472; as a prefix to nouns, ör- or or-, for which see p. 469, col. 2. Indeed, there is a strong probability that the negative prefix ör- is a contraction, not of un-, but of or-, so that ó-bættir is from or-bættir, ó-verðr from or-verðr, by agglutination of r, whereby the vowel becomes long (as the O. H. G. prefix ar- in A. S. appears as ā-): this would account for the fact, that in the very oldest and best vellums there is hardly a single instance of ú- for ó-, and this is the sole modern form not only all over Iceland, but also in most popular idioms of Norway and Sweden; a farther proof is that in many words or-, the ancient form, is preserved in a few vellums, especially of the Norse laws, in such rare forms as ör-sekr, ör-bætligr, ör-vænt, and ó-vænt, where the current form is ó-sekr, etc.; so also, ör-keypis and ó-keypis, ör-grynni and ó-grynni, ör-hóf and ó-hóf. Therefore or-, not un-, is, we believe, the phonetical parent of the later Scandinavian negative prefix ó-. The extensive use of ör- and the utter absence of ú- or un- may be explained by the supposition that, for the sake of uniformity, all words beginning with ör- and un- gradually took the same form; for though in ancient days ör- was more extensively used than it is at present, it can hardly have been the sole form in all words now beginning with ó-: ör- is used as denoting a negative, as ör-grynni, a being bottomless; or lack or loss of, as ör-sekr, out of being sekr; ör-verðr.

2. special usages are, ubat is of yore, as in ör-lög (cp. Germ. ur-, as in ur-theil, Engl. or-deal), ör-nefni, ör-gelmir, ör-vasi. 3. in mod. usage ör- is prefixed to adjectives, = utterly, but only in instances denoting 'smallness,' or something negative, e. g. ör-grannr, ör-stutt, ör-skammr, ör-grunnr, ör-mjör, ör-fátækr, ör-snaudr, ör-eyða, ör-taka, ör-reyta, qq. v.

barn-gjarn, adj. eager for bairns, Gsp. bastarðr, m., cp. the remarks on bæsingr, p. 92, col. 1 at bottom, to which add,—This word is, we believe, derived from báss, a 'boose,' stall, Goth. bansts; its original sense would then be, one born in a stall or crib; hence as a law term, a bastard; hornungr from horn (a corner) is an analogous term, cp. Germ. winkel-kind, for in ancient Teut. laws and language the bastard or outcast was considered as being born in an out-of-the-way place. Both words, bastarðr and bæsingr (q. v.), are, we believe, one in sense and origin, bastarðr being the older form, bæsingr the later; from Goth. banst-s was formed bastarðr, qs. banstarðr; in Norway and Icel. bansts dropped the t and absorbed the n into the preceding vowel, and became bás-s; from this 'báss' was formed bæsingr, with ingr as inflexive syllable, and the vowel changed; whereas bastarðr, we suppose, dates from an early time before vowel-change had taken place.

Both words are law terms, the former Normannic (or Frankish), the latter Norse: both occur as the name of a sword,—bæsingr in the mythical tale, Fb. ii., of St. Olave's sword, ere it was taken out of the cairn; bastarðr in Fms. viii. (12th century), perhaps a sword of Norman workmanship. Literally bastarðr means 'boose-bardy,' the bardy one of the stall, the bastard being the boy who got all kinds of rough usage, and so became hardy; we catch an echo of this in the words of the old lay—kóðu 'harðan' mjök 'hornung' vera, Hðm. 12.

ekkja, u, f, a widow, add—this word (as well as ekkill = Swed. enkling) has no relation to ekki = sobbing, but is derived from einn, one, and an inflexive -ka, like in stúlka, see Gramm. p. xxxii. col. 2. Ekkja originally meant a single woman, a damsel, and is thus used by the ancient poets, e. g. vara sem unga ekkju í öndugi kyssa, Km.; út munu ekkjur líta elmsnúðla þrúðar, Sighvat; 'ekkja' and 'ung kona' are synonymous, Isl. ii. (Gunnl.) in a verse; ekkjan stendr ok undrask áraburð, Lex. Poët. It then came to mean a widow (a single, lone woman), having lost her husband). Ekkja is a word peculiar to all Scand. languages, old and modern; although, as we believe, it superseded a still older 'widuwo' (cp. the Goth., Germ., and Engl.); this change took place at so early a time that no traces are found of that word anywhere in Scand. speech or writing (cp. Swed. en-ka, Dan. en-ke).

If so, it is hardly to be doubted that the division into Rapes existed even in heathen times; and indeed it would have been recorded by Ari in the Íb. had it been made in the time of the first bishops. The word itself and the autumn meetings for the poor are mentioned in Sagas referring to the heathen age, e.g. Fms. i. 225. The men of the 12th century looked on these meetings as a time-honoured institution, as is proved by the reference Fb. iii. 421 (only lately noticed, and given in full s. v. þinga); cp. also Bolla þ. (Ld. 350). [Ivar Aasen bæken; Dan. bigen], greedy, voracious, Merl., Bret. (1849) 44. hæti, n. = hót, a whet; a whet. höfuð,—the words in line 6 to 7, etc., are true in substance, yet the spelling höfuð does at least occur once in Cod. Reg. Sæm., viz. Hbl. 15 (Bugge); hauðuð is certainly the true old form. To höfuð-hlutr, p. 307, col. 2, add,—in mod. usage, höfða-hlutr (in the dual), opp. to fótahlutr, and so spelt in Eg. 398; so also Icelanders say höfða-lag, the head-piece of a bedstead, also the pillow; eg fann það undir höfðalaginu; cp. the phrase, at höfðum þorsteins, at the heads of Thorstein's bed (here in plur. used of a single person); a similar usage of plur. or dual instead of sing. in A. S. is marked in a note to Mr. Sweet's Gregory's Pastoral Care. hörmætiðr, m. a ðr. læy. in Hým. end; may not this word contain a variation or corruption of some month's name, occurring under various forms in A. S. and Germ., and of which the Scand. form is not known, such as Horemænt = November or December, Hornunc = February, Hartmonat = January (Dr. Karl Weinhold),—months of great festivals and sacrifices? For an attempt at interpretation of the passage, see véar, p. 687, col. 1, at bottom. íping, f. (?); þeir festu þá upp í framstaflinum eitt lítið segl svá sem væri íping nokkur, Post. 273. í-grunda, að, to ponder over, ruminate, (mod.) í-leppr, m. a sock to wear in shoes, = leppr, (mod.) ísugr, adj. icy; ísugar báurur, Jd. í-vera, u, f. indwelling, habitation; íveru-hús, a lodging-house, (mod.) íafn-lengd, p. 321, add,—íafn lengd-skrá = an obituary, D. I. i. 256. íafn-lyndi, add,—fem. in Mar. 848. júr-jór = jaur, yes, is quoted in Run. Gramm.

júr = jaur, yes; júr kvað hann, ifast ekki um, Art. 68, cp. Skálda (Thorodd) 163. jögun, f. a barping on the same quarrel. jökull, add,—jökul-hljóð, n. sounds heard in glaciers, Eggeit Itin. 770: jökul-sprunga, u, f. a crevasse. jölstr, m. [Swed. jolster], salix pentandra, a kind of willow, Gkv. i. 19 (Bugge 419). jötun-uxi, add,—medic. a cancer; hann fékk mein í fótum, var þat kallað j. eðr átumein, Bs. ii. 269. kaða, u, f. a ben (?), Edda ii. 488. kaf, u, add the phrase,—eða, hætta í miðu kafi, to end or break off abruptly (in mediis rebus), metaphor from swimming. kaf-ferð, f. submersion, Thom. 495. kaka, u, f. a cake; add a reference from an ancient vellum,—eitt kökukorn, a little cake, Vitae Patrum (Unger). kakki, a, m. a basin; in vatn-kakki, Korm. kaldi, a, m. a cold, chilly breeze. kalna, að, = kólina, (mod.) kamers, n. a chamber, room, privy, (mod.) kangs, n. = kangin-yrði, (mod.) kast, n., add,—a fit; hósta-kast, a fit of coughing; renna stór köst, to take a long run by fits and starts, Hem. káza, u, f., mod. kássa (see p. 335, col. 1); the word is found in Vitae Patrum (Unger), kazu af mjólvi, being a rendering of 'pultem ex farinā.' keip-réttr, adj. bolt upright; standa keipréttr, (mod.) keldu-svín, for 'bedge-bog' read 'rallus aquaticus,' the name of a bird, the water-rail. kenna, the verb, add,—to tell, make known (cp. the Goth. use); kennit mér nafn konungs, tell me the king's name, Hkv. Hjörv.: konungar 'ro fimn, kenni ek þér nöfn þeirra, ek emk inn sétti sjálf, Em.; kenna e-m brautir, to tell one the way, as a guide, Hdm., Hbl. ker-koppr, m. a small basin, Thom. 518. kjalar-fugl, m. a kind of bird, a quail (?), Edda (Gl.) kjarna-mjolk, f. [Dan. kjerne-mælk], 'churn-milk,' butter-milk, Thom. 447. kjarr, m. a kind of bird, a curlew (?), Edda (Gl.) kjós, f., add reference,—Post. 308. kjót-mangari, a, m. a meat-monger, 1 Cor. x. 25 (whence Kjöbmager-gade, in Copenhagen). kland and klanda;—the derivation from the Gr. is erroneous, the word being an old Scand. law term; old Swed. kland = an action, and klanda (with acc.) = to bring an action for or about a thing, see Schlyter. In Icel. the original sense has been lost. klessa, u, f., add reference,—Skáld H. R. klof-vega, in the phrase, ríða k., to ride astride; opp. to ein-vega, like women on a side-saddle, (mod.) knauss, m. a square clod of turf, Lat. caespes; cp. Dan. knøs; the mod. Icel. form is hnauss, q. v. knetta, t, to grumble; engi knettir um annars mein, Mk. knjúkr, m. a crag, knoll; the mod. form is hnjúkr. II. as a pr. name, Landn.; spelt knykr, D. I. i. 399. kol-fella, d, (and kol-fellir, m.), to lose utterly, of a man who loses all his live stock from cold or hunger; hann kolfeldi, be lost his all; það varð kolfellir: it may be a metaph. from cutting wood for charcoal; or perhaps a remnant of an ancient Scand. law term, preserved in early Swed., viz. kull-svarf = the death of mother and child in childbirth, and kjöl-svarf = of husband, wife, and child, all perishing at sea, see Schlyter, cp. Ld. ch. 18. koll-vátr, adj. wet-haired, i. e. drowned, esp. in a ditty. koma, the verb, D. at the end add,—vera kominn upp á e-n, to depend upon one for help; vera upp á aðra kominn, (mod.) konr, add,—konar (generis), Skálda (Thorodd) ii. 40. korn, add,—eitt köku-korn; see kaka. kreppingr, m. a bird, the creeper (?), Edda (Gl.) kriari, a, m. a crier, = Lat. praeco, Mar. (pref. p. xvii). kross, in the remarks on cross-worship add,—þorkell er svá þaðsk fyrir at krossi, gott ey gömlum manni, gott ey ungum manni, Landn. 45. krumla, u, f. = krumma. krýja or krúa, ð, hence the mod. Icel. grúa (það úir og grúir), changing k into g; [Norse krye; cp. Engl. crowd]:—to swarm; það uði og krúði, Egilsson's Poems, 25. krækil-blinda, u, f. 'crook-blind,' blind man's buff; a game also called skolla-leikr, Mar. 1056. kveisa, u, f., add,—kveisu-flug, n. a shooting pain, Mk. kvenn,—the compds, p. 362, col. 2, observe—the ancients prob. said kven- with a single n; 'kven' is still sounded in Kven-grjótt, a local name in western Icel., being the only remnant of the old form. kvíðja, the verb, add,—reflex, kvíðisk þessa verks, forbear to do it, Krók. 6 new Ed. kvika, u, f. obstructions of the ducts in the nose, which used to be thought to be quick (i. e. live) worms; Vespasianus hafði kvikur í nösium, en þat mein kalla þeir 'vespas,' því var hann kallaðr Vespasianus, V. bad 'worms in the nose,' which disease they call vespas, therefore he was called V. (sic), Post. (Unger) 155.

kvisa, u, f. a kind of bird, Edda ii. 488.

kvistr, m., add.—kvikr kvistr, live stock; hann á eigi meir í kvikum kvisti en eina kú, Mar. 1049.

kyrfa, ð, to carve, Grág. ii. 257; cp. kurfur.

kyrra, u, f. calmness, calm, Mar. 1195.

kögðir, m. a kind of stone, Edda (Gl.) ii. 424.

kögurr, m., as to the reference Hbl. 13, add.—the vellum has ögur, but the emendation into kögur is received by Editors; and is made certain by 'kögur-sveinn' in the same verse; but the sense and origin of kögur in this place have been missed by the interpreters. It is indeed a well-known Teut. word, A. S. cocur, O. H. G. chochar, Germ. koche, Dutch koker; the Dan. kogger is prob. borrowed from the Germ., as is the Icel. koffur from Luther's Bible; once on a time it was also a Scand. word, which was since displaced by the compounded örva-malr or ör-malr, q. v.; this passage being the only place where it occurs in an uncompounded form, but it remains in kögur-sveinn, a quiver-boy, who carried the hunter's quiver (?); and in kögur-barn, Norse kogge-barn. Prof. Bergmann has, with his usual insight in Eddic matters, divined the sense when he says, p. 123, 'über den Sund zu schwimmen und dabei seinen feurigen Donner-und blitz-keil, . . . im Wasser zu netzen und abzukühlen.' The fact is, Thor is here represented carrying a quiver full of thunder-bolts on his back, and so the poet makes the mighty thunder-god stop at the Sound, embarrassed, and begging to be ferried over, as he could not wade over from fear of wetting his quiver and quenching the fire, for he must 'keep his powder dry,' although in Gm. and Þd. Thor is not much afraid of the water. Whether kögurr, a quiver, be any relation to kögurr, a quiver, we cannot tell, prob. not; if so, this word should be placed under a separate head.

kör-leginn, adj. = körlagr, Post. 40.

laga-setning, f. legislation (p. 370, col. 1); this word requires explanation,—in old writers it means the constitution, the fundamental laws or political constitution of a commonwealth; as Ari, the historian, says, 'frá Íslands bygð, frá landnáms-mönnum ok lagasetning,' of the settlement of Iceland, of her settlers and her political constitution, Íb. (pref.); where lagasetning refers to the institution of the alþing, and the other events related in Íb. ch. 2 and 3; so also, ritaði hann (viz. Ari) mest í upphafi sinnar bókar um Íslands bygð (the settlement), ok lagasetning (constitution), Hkr. (pref.), referring to the constitutional laws of Ulfljót recorded in ch. 2 of the Icelander Book; lagasetning here exactly answers to what Konrad Maurer, by a mod. term, calls 'die entstehung des Isländisches staates.' So also of the laws of king Hakon the Good (cp. the remarks s. v. þing), lagasetning Hákonar konungs, . . . hann (the king) var maðr stórvitr, ok lagði mikinn hug á lagasetning, hann 'setti' Gulapings-lög . . . Hkr. i. 135 (cp. Fms. i. 31): again, in Ó. H. 227 it answers to the mod. word legislation (of the laws of Sweyn, the son of Alfifa), and so Orkn. 24. It is to be borne in mind that 'lög' has a double sense, viz. law in a strict sense, and in a local-political sense—a 'law-community,' legally constituted state, nearly answering to Gr. πόλις.

lang-viðri, n., add.—langviðrum skjal eyða grund, Mk. 24; cp. Ísland eyðist af langviðrum ok lagaleysi, Ísl. þjóðs. i. 438.

laus-lyndi, add.—fem. in Fas. ii. 124.

laus-mæli, add.—the sing. occurs in Fb. iii. 185.

laus-yrði, add.—fem. in Pr. 133, Fbr. 64 new Ed.

laut, f., add.—this word occurs in Landn. 197 (Hjaltdæla-laut).

lán, n., add.—ekki er lán lengr en léd er, Vídal., a saying.

ledda, u, f. a lead, plumb, a fisher's term in western Iceland.

leið-angr, m. a levy; add.—may not this word be qs. leiðvangr = the field of the Leet, where a Leet was held? if so, it would throw light on the origin of this meeting in very remote times as being a muster-meeting or levy of the king's service: afterwards leiðangr might have come to mean the levy itself. It is indeed difficult to explain this word in any other way, esp. the latter part -angr, which usually denotes a place.

leiðanligr, adj. ductile, manageable, Post.

leiði-þirr, m. a ðr. λεγ., Haustl.; wrongly explained by Egilsson, it is evidently the A. S. lād-þeow = a leader, guide.

leikni, f. playfulness, curiosity; göra e-ð til leiknis, Ísl. þjóðs. i. 615.

létis-maðr = leytismaðr (or hleytismaðr), a vicar, Post. 34.

liðr, observe,—the passage in Hm., svá at hón lyki þik liðum, is perhaps illustrated by Chaucer's 'locen in every lith,' Nonne's Priest's Tale; embraces of witches being believed to rob a man of his manhood.

limpa, u, f. limpness, weakness, Fél. xv; það er limpa í mér, (mod.)

lík-brá, f. = valbrá (q. v.), Fél.

lím-stokkinn, part. out of joint, þiðr. 16.

Ljósá-vatn, n. the light-water, a local name: Ljósveitningar, m. pl. the men of L., Landn.

ljós-ker, n., prop. a 'light-vessel,' a lamp (not lantern), cp. Mar. 679, 1036, 1037, Thom. 483.

ljúga, the verb, add.—pret. pl. lógo, Post. 231; later lugu.

loða, the verb, the Clem. 24 (Post. Unger 63), read,—fundu þeir, at hann loddí 'saman' flærð einni; the passage is therefore quite plain.

logn-alda, u, f. rolling in a calm, of a ship.

lok, n., add.—the word remains in Engl. bem-lock.

Loki, the name of the terrible fire-demon, half god, half giant, the friend and companion of the gods, and yet their most fearful foe. We have a new suggestion to make as to the origin of this name. The old Northern Loki and the old Italic Vulcanus are, we believe, identical; as thus,—the old Teutonic form of Loki, we suppose, was Wlōka, whence, by dropping the w before l, according to the rules of the Scandinavian tongue, Loki. A complete analogy is presented in Lat. voltus, vultus, A. S. wlits, but Icel. lit (in and-lit, a face); and, in point of the character of the two demons, the resemblance is no less striking, as we have on the one hand Vulcanus with Etna for his workshop (cp. the mod. vulcano), and on the other hand the Northern legends of the fettered fire-giant, Loki, by whose struggles the earthquakes are caused. Of all the personages of the Northern heathen religion, the three, Óðinn, Þórr, and Loki, were by far the most prominent; but not even the name of Loki is preserved in the records of any other Teutonic people. Can the words of Caesar B. G. vi, xxi, Solem 'Vulcanum' et Lunam, refer to our Loki? probably not, although in Caesar's time the form would have been Wlōkan in acc., a form which a Roman ear might well have identified with their own Vulcanus. The old derivation from loka, to smut, is inadmissible in the present state of philological science; a Wōdan from vaða, or Loki from loka, is no better than a 'Juno a juvando,' or a 'Neptunus a nando.' May not Loki (Wloka) be a relation to the Sansk. vṛika, Slav. vluku, Lith. vilkas, Icel. vargr, úlfr, meaning a destroyer, a wolf? it is very significant that in the Norse mythology Loki is the father of the world-destroying monsters,—the wolf Fenrir, the World-serpent, and the ogress Hel; and, if the etymology suggested be true, he was himself originally represented as a wolf.

lopt-hæna, u, f. a female pr. name, Landn.; prop. a kind of duck, cp. skálp-hæna (in the Addenda).

lókr, add.—that it originally was a law term, a receiver of stolen goods, is seen from Chaucer (Coke's Tale, 51), 'there is no thief without a lóuk.'

lund-lag, n. temper.

lund-lagt, part. n. minded, disposed, e-m er e-t l., Post. 481, 633.

lyf-steinn, in the vellum of Korm. S. (A. M. 232) it is always spelt with y (not lífsteinn), thus Unger, who has himself consulted the vellum.

lykt, f. [Dan. lögte], a lantern, Bs. ii. 257.

lýð-skyldi, add.—fem. in Fms. x. 339 (sjá hlýðskyldi); but hlýðskyldis, 398.

lýsa, the verb, II. 3. 7, lýsa e-u yfir, better is lýsa yfir e-u.

læri-sveinn, this word is a translation of A. S. leorning-cniht, a word used in Ælfric's English at the time when Christianity was transported from England to Norway and Iceland; at a still earlier time the English rendered 'discipulus' by 'þegn' (Gregory's Pastoral Care).

lœð, f. a laithe, add.—the old form was prob. lauð, with a diphthong; the mod. form is lœð, gen. lœðar.

mal, n. the purring of a cat, Snót 132.

man, a bondman, add.—mans-fólk, captive-folk, prisoners; in Orkn. 368 (Fb. ii. 486, l. 8), þeir seldu þeim sílfr ok 'annat fé' is corrupted for 'mans-fólk,' as is seen from the words of the Danish translation of 1615—'ok solde dennem fangerne.'

mann-bikkja, u, f. a 'man-bitch,' a term of abuse, Post. 151.

manngi, add.—þætta ek við manngi, Post. 230.

man-vélar, f. pl. love-tricks, Hbl. 20.

mæt, n. an estimate; the truer form is mát (like dráp, nám, gát, át, from drepa . . .); the word was originally a Norse law term, and is not found in the Grág., but was, at the union with Norway, adopted in Icel., where it soon lost its long vowel; it is actually spelt maat (i. e. mát) in D. N. ii. 225 (maats menn = taxation); eptir sex manna máti, Jb.; eptir góðra manni máti, Vm.; eptir máti, id. (Mr. Jón Thorkelsson).

mat-fiskr, m. fish for food, Post.

mási, a, m. a nickname, Fms., add.—prop. the name of a bird; in Faroese maasi is a sea-mew; val-maasi, Uislands-maasi (= an Icelandic mew), fiski-maasi, see Mr. H. C. Müller's Færøernes Fugle-fauna (1863).

meðan, add.—hence Dan. men = ben, contracted from meden.

megín-byri, n. a fair wind, Post. 233.

mel-fluga, u, f. a moth in clothes, (mod.)

mest-megn, adv. for the most part, (mod.)

mét, n. sing. = mát, an estimate, D. N. ii. 31; lög-m., Mar. (pref. p. xxxv).

meta, the verb, at the beginning, observe,—the subj. mæti occurs in Vols. S. 85 (Bugge's Ed.)

mey-nunna, u, f. a nun, = virgo monacha, Vitae Patrum (Unger).

mið-seymi, n., sounded misseymi, the gut used in shoe-making.

mikill, add the saying,—mikið skal til mikils vinna, Vidal. ii. 64.
 mikla, ad. add.—hann kvaðsk eigi mundu mikla tillögu við hann ör því hann hafði til unnit, Band. (MS., begin.); the printed text is corrupt. mis-dægrt, n. adj.; in the phrase, honum verðr aldri misdægrt, of a person who is never ill for a single day.
 mis-gáningr, m. an inadvertency.
 mis-grip, n. a 'mis-grip,' mistake; in the phrase, taka e-t í misgripum, take a thing by the wrong end, make a mistake, (mod.) mis-klíð, f. discord.
 mjalli, a, m. [mjöll], whiteness; esp. in the phrase, vera ekki með lum mjalla, to be not 'in one's whole whiteness,' i. e. to be not in one's uses, to be insane.
 móða, u, f. II, add.—af allri móðu bitra munugða, Post. 555.
 mót, a meeting; dele the word 'móts-minni,' which is only a false ending of m for ni, see njóts-minni below.
 mun-hugð = munuð (q. v.), Post. (Unger) 117.
 munu, the verb, add.—munu in exclamations of wonder, contempt; vat moni hvelpr sú ráða griðum? Mork. 80; hvat muni of vinna úrum stum, what should overcome our love? i. e. come what may, it is proof against all, Korm. (in a verse). mystr = mykr (?), Mar. 1031.
 mýgja, the verb, add.—an older pret. mugið or mögði; hence, né lögðu menn óleiti, nor did the people quell their cheer, i. e. they were in gib spirits, Þd. (and not as explained in Lex. Poët.); at hann mýgði (subj.) allri mekt Gyðinga, that he quelled all the might of the Jews,
 mýr-dæla, u, f. 'mire-dale,' a miry, boggy hollow, Hallgr.
 mœrr, f. = mýrr, a moor, bog; æpa kann í mœrum fróskr, Mkv.
 mögðir, m. a kind of stone, Edda ii. 494.
 mösni, a, m. the name of a bear, Edda (Gl.)
 -na, add.—satt-na, Bs. i. 469, v. l. nagl-hald, n. a nail's hold, Bs. ii. 503.
 naumr, add.—naum grið, Bs. ii. 508 (17th century); vera naumt við ominn, to be pressed for time. nár, B, add.—ná-bönd, n. pl. the cords by which the shroud is bound round the body, Mar.
 nef-lauss, adj. [nefi], 'kinless,' orphaned, desolate; sagt er frá hve eftlauss narir, Mkv. nekkverr, add.—Mr. Upström, and since Bugge, derive this word from ne-veit-hverr, instead of Grimm's ne-hverr, cp. A. S. nāt-bwæt = ne- veit-bwæt = Icel. nakkvat; this would better account for the double k, but otherwise it has no influence on the inflexive changes of the word.
 B. nekkverr. In B. IV. 3, nokkor should be put under a separate head—as loc. adverb, = somewhere, anywhere, qs. ne-hvar or ne- ei-hvar.
 nema, the verb, add.—a pret. numdi in mod. usage, formed from the art. numinn, as if from a verb nymja; örvaðist geð á allan hátt er eg umdi sjónum [föður-landið heldr hátt hafit upp úr sjónum, Eggert.
 Nes-konungr, a pr. name, Baut. 402.
 nett-leikr, m. neatness, (mod.)
 njótr, m., add.—njóts-minni, n. [still in Norway called njós-minne, var Aasen, in the new Edition of his Dict., of a cup drunk by customers after striking a bargain]:—a kind of 'earnest-cup'; sendi hann honum ina skál fulla mjaðar, ok bað hann drekka njótsminni (mótsminni is an error), hér með, segir konungr, vil ek gefa þér, Sveinn, jarlsnafn, etc., ms. vi. 52: the suggestion at the end of the article is therefore true.
 Noregr, add.—'Nurviag' on the Jellinge stone. nótt, f., C, add.—nætr-göltz, n. a roving about by night.
 ný-lýsi, n., to the passage Orkn. 420 add.—According to the Saga and an entry in the old Annals the day in question was the evening of the 21st of Dec. 1154, old style; and from information given by Mr. Main (the Radcliffe Observer, Oxford), a full moon fell on this very day in that year, old style. This quite settles the question as to the true old sense of ný and nýlysi. The chronology of Torfaeus in the old Ed. of Orkn. S. is altogether wrong. nýting, f. a term of husbandry; góð, ill nýting, of getting in the hay or crop, Esp. 1761.
 næðingr, m. a chilly blast, = gnæðingr, (mod.) nær-fellt, n. adj. as adv. nearly, almost, (mod.) nökkor, adv., qs. ne-hvar or ne-veit-hvar, somewhere, very freq. in old writers, somewhere, anywhere; to this word belong the references under nekkverr, B. IV. 3, p. 452; to which add,—hér nökkur, Fb. i. 73; nökkur ands eða lagar, Al. 107. In mod. usage this word has become obsolete and is replaced by einhver-staðr; the explanation given under nekkverr, B. IV. 3, must be altered accordingly, and the words 'somewhat, may be' struck out.
 nökkvi, a, m., in the phrase, pungr sem 'nökkvi,' or nökkva-pungr, of things like hay soaked with water or the like. This word can hardly be related to nökkvi, a boat; we think it is qs. n-ökkvi, cp. ökr and ekvast, 'pungr sem einn ökvi' rapidly pronounced sem 'nökví, the n being taken from the preceding word, as in njóli (jóli, p. 326, col. 2). öbbeldi = ofheldi, Thom. 405.

 óðal, instead of B. II. 3, read,—In the old Norse there is a compd alda-óðal, a property of ages or held for ages or generations, Lat. fundus avitus, an ancient allodial inheritance; ok ef eigi er leyst pronunciation = fra 'ald-odels' tid, ld being changed into r). We believe the mid. Lat. all-odium to be derived from this compd, by way of assimilation; the old Teut. form would be alp-odal (Goth. alp = ævum), whence all-odal, allodium, property held in absolute possession, opposed to such as is held in fee or subject to certain conditions. The remarks rælast, dep., in svá mæli Heilagr Andi fyrir munn Davíð konungs, hégómliða 'ræliz' margr maðrinn, Post. (Unger) 425, should, we believe, be 'ræsis,' i.e. hæsisz, to vauzt, puff oneself up, see Ps. xxxix. 6. rödd, f., add,—acc. roddo, as if from radda, Mork. 128.

 rökkr, m. = rokk, a jerkin, Thom. 457.
 rök, f. the band, Edda (Gl.), a ἀ. λεγ., a Slavon. word, Russ. ruka. röst, a mile, add,—by Captain Gerhard Munthe's military map of Norway of A.D. 1827, the distance from Christiania to Eidsvold is about eight geographical miles.

Saga, add the reference to B. 2,—hálf-sögð er saga hver er aðrir einir segja, i.e. 'audiatur ut altera pars,' Bs. i. 582, (mod., það er ekki nema hálsögð saga ef einn segir.)

 sand-flúðir, f. pl., see flúð. sand-yrja, u, f. a quicksand, Safn i. 78.

sannr, adj. sooth, add,—Lat. -sons, -sonis, is the same word; the old Norse law term, sannr at sök, or ú-sannr, eigi sannr at sök, exactly answers to the Lat. law term 'in-sons,' thus Lat. injuriae insons is literally rendered in Icel. by 'ú-sannr at sök.'

satt-na = satt, true, Bs. i. 469, v. l.

sár = sá, demonstr. pron., is of frequent occurrence on Runic stones, e.g. sár eigi flo, be flew not; sár vann Nuvriag at kristnu, be won Norway to Christianity; this 'sár' is simply a nominative case formed like öng, margr, from einngi, manngi.

sjá, the verb, l. 3, add,—pl. só, Clem.

sjá, the pronoun, see sá, sú. This word or form might have been put under a separate head, it is often used in a pointedly demonstr. sense, like þessi; see the references s. v. sá.

sjónhverfis-hringr, m. = sjóndeildar-hringr, Vidal. i. 206.

sjór, B, add,—sjó-blíða, u, f. a sea-calm, Post. 48: sjó-volk, n. a tossing about, fatigue on the sea.

skakk-ylgö, part. threatening, of the waves, Egilsson's Poems.

skalli, a, m., add,—skalli, kom þú á morgin, Post. 250.

skapt-hár, observe,—we suspect that in the phrase 'skapthá sól,' of the sun just after sunrise, is concealed another sense; it is not 'spear-high,' but akin to A.S. sceaf-mond = half a foot, or six inches, meaning the moment when the sun has got just half a foot above the hills; the definition given by the ancients themselves in K. þ. K. 96 is artificial and can hardly be etymologically true; the word was perhaps borrowed from the A.S., and so the old Icelanders themselves did not quite understand it; cp. the phrase, ganga skapta-muninn, to walk just half a pace, Lv. 35 (see skapt i. 2. at the end).

skata, u, f., add the saying,—þegir barnið meðan það étr skötu-fóttinn.

lashing the sea before a gale; the metaphor is from the game of skinn-leikr, Ísl. þjóðs. ii. 129.

skjall-hvít, adj. white as skjall, q. v.

skjarr-sýnn, adj. quick-eyed, Post. 636, v. l.

skjár, m., observe,—skjár is prop. the bladder stretched on frames and used for glass, as still used in Norway, thus skjaa-lykta = a lantern of bladder, opp. to a glass-lantern; in Icel. the word has since come to mean the window or opening; whilst the bladder itself is called líkna-belgr.

skjól-stæðingr, m. a client, (mod.)

skol-brúnn, the best Engl. rendering would be olive, of complexion.

skonnorta, u, f. a schooner, (mod.)

snudda, u, f. a small strap or rag, e.g. of paper or the like; bréf-s.

stef-settr, part. furnished with stef (burden), Post. 511.

stein-grár, adj. stone-gray, iron-gray, of a horse, (mod.)

stela, the verb, II, add,—eg stalt til þess, to do a thing by stealth, of a very busy person who has to steal the time to get a thing done, (mod.)

stig-vel, n. a stirrup, Thom. 420.

stíman, n. a bard tussel, Post. 584.

stjarna, at the end, I,—the names in the old lay Sdm. 15 and beginning of 16 are, we believe, astronomical,—the 'Ear of Árvak,' the 'Hoof of Alsvinn' (the Sun Horses), the 'Wheel under the Chariot of Rungnir,' the 'Teeth (or Reins) of Sleipnir,' the 'Sledge Harness,' the 'Bear's Paw,' the 'Tongue of Bragi,' the 'Wolf's Claws,' the 'Eagle's Nose,' and perhaps others.

The Cod. Reg. I. c. reads 'Rungnis,' the Völ. S. 'Rögnis,' i.e. Odin, for Hrungrnir the giant would here be out of question, see Bugge's foot-note to l. c.

straum-mikill, adj. running with great current, Orkn. (Lex. Run.)

strúpi, a, m., better form than strjúpi (q. v.), mjólk hljóf ór strúp-anum, Post. (Unger) 213.

súrr, m. a sour drink, add reference,—Vitae Patrum (Unger).

svart, adj., B. svart-höfði, add,—the 'black-cap' or pewit gull, Bewick; whence used as a pr. name.

sverfa, the verb, add the phrase,—sultur sverfr að, bunger pressed hard.

svíkja, the verb, add,—hann siku (i. e. sviku) Blaku-menn í útfaru, . . . Guð svíki þá er hann sviku, Baut. (Brocm. 179).

Svölðr, f. a local name of a current (not an island) near Hiddense (Héðins-ey), west of Rügen; a rendering of a Wendish name, the Swelche, wirripool (?); fyrir Svölðar minni, before the mouth of S.; and 'fyrir Svölð,' Edda 83, also Knytl. S. ch. 120, 122; see the conclusive essay on the place and date of this battle by Mr. Jørgensen, in Aarb. for Nord. Oldk. og Hist. 1869; to which add, that 'Héðins-ey' actually occurs, although disguised, in Hallfred's poems, composed immediately after the battle, viz. 'á víðu sundi Héðins-eyjar' for 'Héðins-meyjar' of the MSS.; and breiðan bekk Héðins 'rekka' of the same poem (Fs. 218, 219, verses 12, 15, being a local name, not a kenning).

 tjalda, the verb, add.—að tjalda til einnar nætr, to pitch the tent for a single night, of shifty, changeable human things which stand to-day and to-morrow are swept away, a common saying in Icel. (even as in Arabic, see Mr. Littré's Inaugural Address to the French Academy); and, það verðr að tjalda því sem til er, one must use the bangings one has, i.e. one must make the best of it. In the former case the metaphor is taken from the pitching a tent, in the latter from the dressing the hall (or church) on festive occasions.
 tolla, the verb,—for a suggestion as to its origin see þola II; we now believe this to be the real origin of the word.
 tólf-faldr, adj. twelvefold, Post. 513. tón-laust, n. adj. without intonation, Thom. 455.

 vetr-grænn, adj. 'winter-green,' ever-green (cp. Dan. vintergrønt), Rkv.

vinda, the verb, l. 1, 'ving' in the ditty of Grætt. is, we believe, q. 'vring,' from the obsolete vringa, to wring, from which vingur, q. v.
 vind-högg, n. a stroke in the wind or a stroke astunt; in the poem, hanti skær ekki vindhoggum, of a steady worker who never loses a minute.
 vindóttr, adj. bay-coloured, of a horse.
 vín-sýra, u, f. vinegar, Post. 580.

 þrá-rækkr, adj. persevering, Post. (Unger) 434.
 þrymr, m., add.—in the old lay, Em. 2, for hvat þrymr þar, we read, hvat þrym (dat.) er þar, what din is there? The lost vellum, we suppose, had 'hvat þrym' þar, where 'might be the inflexive -r, but was meant to be the personal verb 'er,' often written in this abbreviated form above the line; þryma or þrymja, =tonare, is never found in old prose writers or poets; the conclusive reason is that the true idiomatic construction in this case is 'hvat' with a dative, and not with a verb (cp. hvat er þat hlym hlymja, Skm.)
 þunn-vembi, n. [vömb], the abdomen, Hem. (MS.)
 þursa-stafr, m., see þurs,—the notion of the magical Rune is preserved in the phrase, rista e-m þursa-staf, to liah a person in a coarse, brutal manner; það var mesta ofdirfð af ótillkjörnu flóni, | að rista þenna þursa staf þorlákss-syni Jóni, Grönd.

 þvengr, m., add the following curious reference,—Hjörleifr konungur var upp festr í konungs höll með skó-þvengjum sínum sjálfs millum elda tveggja . . . Á meðan vakti Hildir ok jós mungáti í eldana, ok kvæð 'Hjörleifi þat verra,' hún leysti hann svá at hún hjó með sverði skó-þvengina (thus, we believe, to be emended for 'ok kvæð Hjörleif þar vera,' etc., of the vellum), king H. was bung up in the king's hall by his shoe-thongs between two fires . . . In the meantime H. kept awake, and poured ale into the fires, saying that this was worse (more tantalizing) for him; she then released him by cutting the thongs with a sword, Fas. ii. 34.

A LIST OF BRITISH RIVERS,

About a hundred in number, contained in old Icelandic alliterative memorial verses (inscribed á-heiti, i. e. names of rivers) from MSS. of the Snorra-Edda (ii. 479, 480, of the 13th century; the verses themselves may well be of the 12th century). Most of these rivers seem to belong to the northern Scottish counties, Caithness, Ross, Moray, Sutherland, and to the north-east of England. As specimens of an attempt at identification we add about thirty names, half for Scotland and half for England, leaving the rest open. In Scotland, Örmr, Armet W.; Sekin, Shin R.; Dyrn, Durn W.; Mein, Mein W.; Skialg, Shallag W.; Nis, Ness R.; Ekla or Ekkjall, Oykill R.; Spæ, Spey R.; Nið, Nith R.; Þöll, Thuil R.; Dyna, Don R.; Njörn, Nairn R.; Bro, Brora R.; Maura, Strath More; Apardion, Aberdeen (here used of the river). In England, Tems, Thames R.; Humra, Humber R.; Dun, Don R.; Alin, Alne R.; Svöl, Swale R.; Usa, Ouse R.; Þyn, Tyne R.; Tvedda, Tweed R.; Lodda, Ludd R.; Ver, Wear R.; Ruðr, Rother R.; Ró, Rye R.; Hrið, Reed R.; Myn, Maun R.; Mynt, Mint R. (Johnston). A few (ten or twelve) of the rivers in the verses are of other countries, being probably added for alliteration sake, e. g. Jordan, Tiber, Euphrates, Albis, Loire; these we have omitted. Some of these names also occur in old lays (Gm., Bm., Gs., Hkv.), and this list may thus afford a hint as to the age of these poems.

GAELIC NAMES AND NICKNAMES

Contained in the Landnáma-bók (Icelandic Book of Settlement); those in the Orkn. and the Njála are left out, as being already well known. The translation and identification we leave to Celtic scholars, only noticing that these names, as well as those of the rivers above, were taken from oral tradition, not from books; the Norse form may therefore throw some light on the Celtic pronunciation of the 10th to the 12th centuries.
